LORD WATSON.—This is a taxing statute applicable equally to real estate in Scotland and in England; and, following the principles which were laid down by the noble and learned lords who decided Saltoun (Lord) v. Advocate-General, it is clear that if the interest of an heir of entail can by any fair interpretation be brought within the words "estate of inheritance" it ought to be so brought.—p. 307.

CAIRNS, L.C.—I look upon the construction of the 2nd section (Succession Duty Act, 16 & 17 Vict. c. 51) as to cases coming within it, as completely and finally settled by the cases in this House . . . and especially by the cases of Braybrooke and Floyer, and as no longer open to controversy.—p. 437.

LORD HATHERLEY.—Now whatever difficulties might have surrounded this case . . . as regards the first portion, namely, whether or not this case falls within the 2nd section or the 4th section, appear to me to be covered by the authorities which have been mentioned, that is to say, the three cases in this House . . . namely Braybrooke's Case, Floyer's Case, and Smythe's Case . . . No doubt Floyer's Case was not overlooked in the decision of subsequent cases. It is referred to in those decisions, and the case seems to have been altogether well considered. If that case be law which we must hold it to be, as being a decision of this House, then I apprehend, the matter is settled. This case falls within the 2nd section, and consequently, according to Floyer's Case especially, does not fall within the 4th.—p. 442.

HALSBURY, L.C.—“Succession” in the Act means not the act of succeeding, but property chargeable with duty under the Act, and, as Bramwell B. pointed out in Pryton, In re (supra, col. 2874), property may escape the tax for all time by always passing inter vivos.—p. 832.

LORD HERSCHELL.—In Solicitor-General v. Law Reversionary Interest Society (supra) the Ct. of Ex. laid down certain conclusions as established on a consideration of the various sections of the Act. They held that, though the duty is not payable until the time of actual enjoyment of the property, “the title to the succession dates from the disposition, and there is never any title to the property free from the duty,” and that a person who has had a succession conferred upon him cannot, by parting with it, prevent it from being a succession. The only case which affords any support to the idea that a new succession can take the place of an old one is Cooper and Allen's Contract, In re. . . I cannot see how the reasoning of the learned judge establishes that in the case before him there could be only one succession duty payable, and that in respect of the new succession . . . It was, however, argued for the Crown that Att.-Gen. v. Cecil (supra, col. 2874) was an authority in favour of their contention that s. 15 was inapplicable. I do not think so. . . There may have been some divergence in the reasons given by the learned judges in the case which I have been considering for the conclusion at which they arrived, but there is nothing really inconsistent with the construction which I have put upon s. 15. On the contrary, according to the report of the case in the Law Journal, which is fuller than in the Law Reports, Kelly, C.B. said: “If the charge had been made or the term had been created out of the original succession, it would have come strictly within the words of this section of the Act,” that is, s. 15, “and would have created no new succession at all.” In Braybrooke v. Att.-Gen. (supra, col. 2872), Lord Wensleydale said that s. 15 was meant to meet the simple case of a person having a right to a succession within the meaning of the Act totally alienating that right to another person before the succession opens, or carving out a derivative interest from it, in which case the section provides that the assignee or the person having the derivative title shall stand on the same footing as the assignor. But if there is something different from a mere transfer of the interest or a part of it, if there is a title conferring a new succession in any other person, then s. 15 does not apply. In Att.-Gen. v. Yelverton (post, col. 2877), Martin, B., in delivering the judgment of the majority of the Court, said of s. 15: “It seems to us to refer to a species of property different from that on which the duty is claimed in the present case—that is to say, a reversionary property, in respect of which the assignor would have been liable to duty, but which he has assigned.” There is thus a considerable weight of judicial opinion in support of the views I have expressed.—pp. 835—9.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—There was, no doubt, one point which came under discussion in connection with the Succession Duty Act on which Martin, B. did differ from Lord Wensleydale, but that point had no reference to s. 15. The point of difference, as explained very fully by Lord Selborne in Charlton v. Att.-Gen. (supra, col. 2873), was a point upon the general principles of law applicable to the execution of powers. On that Lord Wensleydale differed, not only from Martin, B., but also from Lord Cranworth in the H.L. The report of Att.-Gen. v. Cecil in the Law Journal seems to be more accurate than that in the Law Reports. The expression attributed to Martin, B. in the Law Reports, in which Lord Esher and Rigby, L.J., discover a difference of opinion between that learned Judge and Lord Wensleydale, and on which to some extent their judgment is based, is not to be found in the report in the Law Journal. In the corresponding passage in the Law Journal Martin, B. actually expresses his concurrence with Lord Wensleydale, referring obviously to the passage in Braybrooke v. Att.-Gen., where the noble and learned lord deals with s. 15.—p. 841.

PALLES, C.B.—Lord Advocate v. Fleming, which was much relied on for the defendants, would have been in point had the present case turned on Clause (c.) [Finance Act, 1894, s. 2], as it was decided upon the Customs and Inland Revenue Acts of 1881 and 1889, parts of which are incorporated in that Clause, but it has no bearing whatever upon the liability to duty under Clause (d.), which is the question here. The ratio decidendi there was that as from 1883 until the father's death in 1890 the policies had been, in fact, kept up by the daughter, and not by the father, they were not "kept up by the father for the benefit of the daughter," within the meaning of the statutes.—p. 90.

JESSEL, M.R.—I think that the Guardian Life Office are the assignees of the policy within the 17th section of the Succession Duty Act, and consequently no duty is payable by them. It appears to me that the point was decided by the unanimous opinion of the Ct. of Ex. in Att.-Gen. v. Abdy, although that case was a totally different one from this. There a testator had bequeathed the sum assured to his sister. A previous decision had determined that such a bequest was not liable to legacy duty, but it was decided that there was no such exemption under the Succession Duty Statute, and accordingly the fund was held liable to succession duty. That is all that was decided in that case, but in arriving at that conclusion every Judge treated this as an ordinary policy of insurance.—p. 283.

CHARLES, J.—In Higgins, In re, in which the parties, probably regarding the point as long settled, consented that the case should be argued on the assumption that succession duty was payable on the fund, it is true that a doubt was expressed in the C.A. as to whether Lord Advocate v. Roberts' Trustees (supra) and Micklethwait, In re (post, col. 2881) had decided the question, but the Court did not overrule or even dissent from Lord Advocate v. Roberts' Trustees. Micklethwait, In re, was a decision on s. 38 of the Act. Fryer v. Morland (supra, col. 2878) only decides that the Act does not apply to a conveyance on sale.—p. 465.

BLACKBURN, J.—*Att.-Gen. v. KEKEWICH, J.—The question there was whether the father, who had become entitled to his son's estate, was to pay a duty in respect of that son's interest, which was an interest in reversion expectant on the father's death; and the claim of the Crown . . . was for the duty on the whole of the fund in respect of the prospective succession of the son (or his estate) to the father, and the result was that it was argued, and successfully argued, that all that was claimed was duty in respect of the son's estate; and that if affidavit duty was to be paid on the son's estate, then no further duty was to be paid in respect of it by reason of the application of s. 41 of the [Customs and Inland Revenue] Act of 1881. That seems to me to have no application at all to what I have to deal with here. I am not dealing with prospective succession at all—in fact, the event has actually occurred.—p. 589.

STIRLING, J.—It was contended, however, that the present case is governed by Croft, In re. If I thought that that case were in point, I should consider it my duty to follow it; but in my opinion it is not in point. It relates to the duty imposed by s. 38 [Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881] upon voluntary settlements. It does not relate to the incidence of the duty as between specific and residuary legatees in the ordinary sense, but between appointees of various parts of a specific fund. In that case Kekewich, J., came to the conclusion that in the absence of any provision by the Legislature as to the incidence of the duties, regard must be had to the intention of the testator. It seems to me that that general principle is not applicable as between specific and residuary legatees, and that the general principle laid down by Lord Selborne in Robertson v. Broadbent (53 L. J. Ch. 266; 8 App. Cas. 812) governs the case, and the specific legatees are entitled to their property free from the duty.—p. 71.

KEKEWICH, J.—It seems to me that this case is one which is not covered by authority. Croft, In re, decided by myself, has been cited, but seems to me to have nothing to do with the present case. In the last edition of the work now known as Hanson's "Death Duties," at p. 379, the principle on which Croft, In re, was decided is accurately stated; and it is shown also by the distinction taken in reference to it by Stirling, J., in Bourne, In re, which case also seems to me to have nothing to do with the present case, except for the observation of Stirling, J., in the passage at p. 192, which has been cited: "In this Act" (i.e., the Act of 44 & 45 Vict., c. 12), "there is not to be found any more than in the Probate Duty Acts, any intimation as to how the probate duty is to be paid." There is no doubt that it was not intended by the Act to decide questions between different parties. The object of the Act is to provide for levying duty for the Inland Revenue, and in an Act of that kind one does not expect to find rules as to administration of estates laid down, and, as a matter of fact, no such rules are laid down.—p. 487.

HALSBURY, L.C.—In this case I entirely agree with the judgment which was given by Rigby, L.J., in Att.-Gen. v. Dodington, and I agree with the learned judges in Ireland, who have taken the same view. It only remains to say that I shall move that this appeal be dismissed. I have the less hesitation in speaking of it thus compendiously, because I think it would be impossible to answer and difficult to improve upon the judgment given by the Chief Baron in Ireland. It appears to me that he has exactly expounded the construction of the question and the logical effect of the language, and the only thing that one feels a difficulty about is that there is a certain amount of want of logic, considering the reasoning both in that and in the Dodington Case, in the money having been paid for duty upon the death of Mr. Studdert. But here, as there, there is no cross-appeal. The result is that we must leave the matter as it stands. I have no hesitation in expressing my own opinion that Rigby, L.J., was right in that particular, and, had the question so arisen, I should have unhesitatingly agreed to a judgment which would have gone to the full extent.—p. 43.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I entirely agree with the views expressed by Rigby, L.J., in Att.-Gen. v. Dodington, which have the approval of the L.C.B. and Holmes, L.J., and I am compelled to dissent from the construction placed upon the Act by FitzGibbon and Walker, L.J.J., a construction which seems to me calculated to reproduce the difficulties which I had thought were cleared away by the decisions of this House in Att.-Gen. v. Beech (col. 2884) and Cowley (Earl) v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (col. 2885).—p. 45.

KENNEDY, J.—It was there [Lord Advocate v. Fife (Earl) (supra)] found that there was an actual assignment to the son of the policies. Under a distinct bargain, by which the father was relieved of considerable difficulty, the son took over the policies, or, in other words, became assignee of them. Although he could not at the time actually realise, he would have had the right, as my brother Phillimore has pointed out, to deal with the policies by way of surrender as he pleased. That is not the case here. Brown v. Att.-Gen. seems to me to throw some light upon the principle by which such cases as this ought to be decided—namely, that if the transaction is in substance a purchase, the duty is not payable; but that if it is in substance a family arrangement or settlement by which a benefit passes on the death of the deceased, the duty is payable. . . . It was there held that the transaction was a family arrangement, and that the duty was payable. It seems to me that this is a still stronger case, inasmuch as there was here, so to speak, no attempt at a purchase, but merely a benefit conferred upon the remainderman by way of compensation for a benefit conferred by him upon the tenant for life. . . . As appears from the very full judgment of my brother Channell in that case [Att.-Gen. v. Dobree (post)], two separate points were there decided. The first was that a policy of life assurance falls within sect. 2 sub sect. (1) (d) of the [Finance] Act. To that extent we follow that case. The other point upon which the decision really rests was that the exemption from duty in sect. 3 did not apply. As regards that point, I agree that the decision is in no way binding upon us here, because there was there unquestionably an element which does not exist here. In that case the only original consideration was the consideration of marriage, which had been held not to be a consideration in money or money's worth. That case, therefore, could not be treated as an authority turning upon the operations of sect. 3. It is not a decision in any way covering this case, because here, if there be any consideration, it is not marriage, but the benefits which the defendant conferred upon his father by concurring with him in the acts which cut off the entail and made the other arrangements possible.—p. 199.

PHILLIMORE, J.—The decision of the Ct. of Sess. upon the facts (which decision I in no sense desire to quarrel with, as it seems to me a perfectly right one upon the facts as well as the law) brings Lord Advocate v. Fife (Earl) into line with Fryer v. Morland (ante, p. 2878). Here there is no purchase at all. . . . I say nothing about Att.-Gen. v. Dobree—it would not be proper that I should unless to assent to it; but it seems to me to have no bearing upon this case, and therefore I pronounce no opinion upon it.—p. 201.

KEKEWICH, J.—Plaintiff's counsel has cited to me a dictum of Lord Westbury in Cullen v. Att.-Gen. for Ireland. Defendant's counsel truly says that the case before the House of Lords does not touch the present, as in the case cited it was a question whether duty was payable under certain Acts of Parliament, and it was disposed of on the construction of those particular Acts. . . . Lord Westbury lays down a general principle, and one about which there can be no doubt, in these words—he says: "The title of the party claiming under the secret trust, or claiming by virtue of that personal confidence, is a title dehors the will, and which cannot be correctly termed testamentary." I accept that as an exposition of the law upon that particular point.—p. 661.

KEKEWICH, J.—It was attempted to distinguish that case [Culverhouse, In re] on the ground that there the direction was to pay the testamentary expenses of another person. That is true, and the distinction is of importance with reference to one of the points argued and decided in that case; but as regards the point with which I am dealing here, my judgment was based entirely on the reasoning that, as payment of estate duty was essential to obtaining a grant of probate, that duty must be considered as much a testamentary expense as any other payment necessary or properly incurred by the executors for that purpose.—p. 753.

BURNES, J.—In Treasure, In re, Kekewich, J. held that the appointed fund does not under such circumstances [i.e., where a general power of appointment by will over a fund has been exercised] pass to the executors "as such;" but there was another ground of decision—namely, that the duty fell within the description of "testamentary expenses," which were directed to be paid out of residue, and consequently that, although the fund did not pass to the executor "as such," the duty fell to be paid out of residue. In Moore, In re, Buckley, J. declined to follow the opinion expressed by Kekewich, J., and held, in a case where there was no direction as to payment of testamentary expenses, that the appointed fund did pass to the executor "as such," and that the estate duty was on that ground payable out of residue. The point again came before Kekewich, J. in Maddock, In re (supra), there being no direction as to payment of testamentary expenses, when, as I am informed, without fresh argument, he adhered to his opinion as expressed in Treasure, In re, notwithstanding the decision in Moore, In re. . . Prior to the passing of the Probate Duty Act, 1860, property over which the deceased had a general power of appointment only was not subject to probate duty. This was decided in Drake v. Att.-Gen., affirming the decisions of Lord Langdale in Platt v. Routh [ante, col. 2851]. . . Lord Langdale's decision in Platt v. Routh was in accordance with the decision of the Ct. of Ex. . . It is, I think, quite clear that the appointed property was considered not to pass to the executor virtute officii or "as such." Kindersley, V.-C., in Cook v. Gregson [(1896) 25 L. J. Ch. 706; 3 Drew, 547; 2 Jur. (N.S.) 510 (ante, col. 2848)], in considering the difference between what are legal and what are equitable assets says that "every item of property come to the hands of the executor which he has recovered, or had a right to recover, merely virtute officii, i.e., which he would have had a right to recover if the testator had merely appointed him executor without saying anything about his property or the application thereof" is legal assets. Lord Chelmsford, in Att.-Gen. v. Brunning [ante, col. 2848], expressly approves of this passage. In the last mentioned case the question was whether or not money paid to an executor under a contract for sale of land entered into by the testator was legal or equitable assets. And Lord Cranworth observes, ". . . what an administrator is entitled to recover as administrator, virtute officii, can never be equitable assets." Lord Cranworth also points out that foreign assets were not liable to probate duty, not being recoverable by virtue of the English probate; and when they come to the hands of the executor they do come because he has established a title in a foreign jurisdiction. In Davies' Trusts, In re [(1871) 41 L. J. Ch. 97; L. R. 13 Eq. 163; see "POWERS," ante, col. 2202] Wickens, V.-C., states it as settled law that a testator who has a general power of appointment directing payment of his debts without more, and appointing an executor, makes the appointed fund liable in aid of his own assets for payment of his debts; and he expresses his opinion that the same rule would apply though no executor were appointed. I think that it is also established that the appointment of executor without more would not make the funds assets—Davies' Trusts, In re, and Thurston, In re [(1886) 55 L. J. Ch. 564; 32 Ch. D. 508; see "POWERS," ante, col. 2204]. . . I do not think that by the [Finance] Act it was intended, or that the effect of the section under discussion [sect. 9, subsect. 1] is to convert equitable into legal assets or to cause property to pass to his executor virtute officii, which had not previously so passed; nor, as I have said, do I believe that James, L.J., in Hoskin's Trusts, In re [(1877) 46 L. J. Ch. 817; 6 Ch. D. 281; see "POWERS," ante, col. 2214], meant to decide or to express an opinion which would have a similar result.—pp. 781, 783.

Sharman, In re, Wright v. Sharman (1901) 70 L. J. Ch. 671; [1901] 2 Ch. 280, 283; 84 L. T. 859. KEKEWICH, J.—In Clemow, In re (supra, col. 2890), . . . the only question that arose was in respect of personal estate, and with respect to the estate duty which it was necessary for the executors to pay in order to obtain probate of the will. Again, in Treasure, In re (supra, col. 2890), there was only personal estate in question. . . The point must have been considered by Joyce, J. in Jolley, In re, though he seems to have been dealing specially with the particular facts of that case when giving his decision, and did not lay down any general law. . . But, so far as it is an authority upon the point before me, it is an authority in favour of the real estate bearing its own estate duty, notwithstanding a direction to pay the testamentary expenses. Applying that to the present case, . . . I must hold that "testamentary expenses" do not include the estate duty payable in respect of real estate. . . Counsel for the residuary legatees has called my attention on this point to Palmer, In re, where Buckley, J. decides this point exactly. He says "that the language of sect. 9, sub-sect. 1, of the Finance Act, 1894, must be construed with reference to the law as it stood at that time, and not in accordance with the provisions of the Land Transfer Act 1897. Therefore, the real estate did not 'pass to the executor,' and it was charged with a rateable part of the estate duty." That case is only reported as a note at present, and I take it that now it will not find its way into any more permanent report; but it is very plainly stated by the learned judge, and I think it my duty to follow it without question.—p. 672.

HUDDLESTON, B.—The justices have found that he is a servant who, being bond fide employed in some other capacity, is partially employed in the capacity of groom. A man may be said to be employed partially in a capacity when he is in a continuous service, in which particular periods of the day are allotted to particular duties. If he is employed as a groom, then he does not do the work of a groom occasionally only, that constitutes the difference between this case and that of Yelland v. Vincent. In Yelland v. Vincent the justices found that the individual in question was a servant who was bonâ fide employed by the respondent in the capacity of yardman on the respondent's farm, and that he was also bonâ fide employed by the respondent in the capacity of groom, and that he was in fact both yardman and groom, and was responsible for and performed the duties of each office. There the justices did not find that the servant was only "occasionally and partially" employed, and the finding being that he was bonâ fide employed, the exemption did not apply. In the present case the justices find that the servant was a person who being bonâ fide employed by the respondent in some other capacity, was partially employed by him in the capacity of groom. I therefore think that the decision of the justices was correct.—p. 913. CAVE and WILLS, JJ. agreed.

- ESHER, M.R.—I should be sorry if it were supposed that we are interfering with any of the cases cited to us. But I may be allowed to say that what I am reported to have said in Yeo v. Dawe (supra) as to the parties not intending the document to be a promissory note, meant nothing more than that the intention of the parties is an element to be taken into account in considering what is the nature of the document. I should also be sorry to derogate in any way from the reasoning in British India Steam Navigation Co. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners. I do not think that either of those cases govern the present case.—p. 355.

- GRANTHAM, J.—The definition of "promissory note" in sect. 33 of the Stamp Act, 1891, and in the corresponding section of the former Stamp Act of 1870, has been so drawn as to include documents which are not usually regarded as promissory notes. The leaning of the judges has been towards a restrictive interpretation of it. In Yeo v. Dawe (supra) the Court (Bowen, L.J. dissenting) held that the document there in question did not come within the section. In Mortgage Insurance Corporation v. Inland Revenue Commissioners it was laid down that the section does not apply to the document where the promise to pay money is part of a contract containing other stipulations. . . . It seems to me that the words "on the day of the transfer of the licence" only fix the time of payment, and do not amount to an additional stipulation within the meaning of the judgments in Mortgage Insurance Corporation v. Inland Revenue Commissioners.—p. 332. CHANNELL, J. concurred.

[BAYLEY, J., in Rex v. Pendleton, says: "Though we cannot look at the unstamped instrument for the purpose of proving by it any agreement between the parties; for such is the general import of the Stamp Acts; yet the Court may look at it to see whether it applies to other evidence of a contract between them. As if a contract in writing be made, not stamped, for the sale and delivery of certain goods on certain terms, the Court in an action for the non-delivery of goods upon a contract proved by parol evidence only, may look at the instrument to see whether it applies to the goods then sought to be recovered for: and if those goods were not included in the contract, parol evidence may be received of the contract sought to be recovered upon. So here, the Court might look at the instrument to see the duration of the first contract under it, in order to guide them in receiving parol evidence of the subsequent service, to which it did not apply."—p. 455.]

ABINGER, C.B.—The practice has prevailed in Westminster Hall ever since I have known it, and before every judge for the last quarter of a century, that, in an action for work and labour, though the counsel stated that he was proceeding for some extra work, yet, if it appeared on cross-examination that the work was done under a contract in writing, the judge immediately stopped him from giving evidence of the contract. I think I can remember hundreds of cases where that has occurred, and where it has never been disputed. We are now asked to disturb this practice merely on the obiter dictum of a judge. If we were to do so the law would become every day more and more unsettled.—p. 428.

POLLOCK, B.—In each case it was held that the agreement was a security for a sum of money at stated periods for an indefinite period, and that the stated periods were annual. I entirely agree with these decisions. In Jones v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, the agreement that an annual sum was to be paid; and in Sweetmeat Automatic Delivery Co. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, the words "yearly rent" occur in the agreement. In those cases there was no difficulty in applying the Act [Stamp Act 1891] to those payments and agreements. But in the present case the only payment we find contemplated is a weekly payment.—p. 586. BRUCE, J. concurred.

COLLINS, L.J.—I confess that I was startled at the outset of the case by hearing that I was a party to a decision—Jones v. Inland Revenue Commissioners—which did not on its prima-facie statement commend itself to my judgment; but now that I have heard the argument, and had the opportunity of reading the judgment, I cannot see any escape from the decision I arrived at there. I have nothing further to add to what I said in that case, except that in citing Taylor v. Pendleton Overseers (1887) 56 L. J. M. C. 146; 19 Q. B. D. 288, in that case I was obviously making a mistake and confounding it with Thames Conservators v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (supra). All that I said there had reference to that case, and not to Taylor v. Pendleton Overseers; and I must say that, after reading again the decision in Thames Conservators v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, I think that that decision is open to the observations which I ventured to make upon it in Jones v. Inland Revenue Commissioners.—p. 227.

[NOTE.—The correction has reference to the report of Jones v. Inland Revenue Commissioners in the Law Reports [1895] 1 Q. B. 484, at p. 495. In the Law Journal Reports (64 L. J. Q. HALSBURY, L.C.—In order that sect. 70 [Stamp Act, 1870] may apply, the property must be actually transferred by the instrument itself, not merely by virtue of an equitable doctrine. In *Inland Revenue Commissioners v. LORD CAIRNS.—The law with regard to the presumption to be made as to the stamping of lost instruments appears to me to be stated correctly in a sentence in the book of Mr. Taylor on Evidence [4th. ed. p. 153], in which all the authorities which have been referred to to-day are collected. Mr. Taylor says: "If secondary evidence is tendered to prove the contents of an instrument which is either lost or retained by the opposite party after notice to produce it, the Court will presume that the original was duly stamped unless some evidence to the contrary is given." The cases which have been referred to at the bar are here collected in a foot-note. They are Hart v. Hart, Crowther v. Solomons, Pooley v. Goodwin, Rex v. Long Buckby, and Closmadenc v. Carrel.—p. 175.

MacLeod v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (1885) 12 Rottie 1045.—CT. OF SESS.

LORD PRESIDENT INGLIS.—The second case

[Phillips v. Inland Revenue Commissioners] does not require any particular consideration, because it follows as a matter of course upon the first [Christie v. Inland Revenue Commissioners]; but the first certainly requires attention, and it appears to me that it differs from the present in a very essential respect . . . The retiring partners in that case got no portion of the co-estate whatever, whereas here Mr. Wilson obtains a subject—one half of the co-estate—of the value of 8,000*l.* No part of the co-estate in Christie's Case was retained by or given to either of the retiring partners. What they got was cash and nothing else—cash or its equivalent in a security for money. . . Indeed, I think the general principle upon which the C.B. proceeds there is just that which I am proposing to adopt in the present case. He says, "In all these cases it appears to me that the substance of the transaction is alone to be considered upon the question whether the instrument is liable to the stamp duty under the statute, and the substance of this transaction collected from the pleas certainly seems to me to be a sale by Mr. Black to Mr. Christie of Mr. Black's interest in the plaintiffs property for the sum of 110,000*l.*" This is exactly the view I take of the present case, and the present, I think, differs from that just in the very respect which constitutes the distinction between a sale and a division.—p. 1049.

(E.) HALSBURY, L.C. dissenting.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—We were much pressed with Smelting Co. of Australia v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, which at first sight appears to be contrary to this view, because it was there held that a sole licence to use in a district of New South Wales an invention protected by a patent granted in that colony was "property" within this sub-section [sect. 59, sub-sect. 1, Stamp Act, 1891], but did not come within the exception of "property locally situate out of the United Kingdom." But that was a mere personal right attached to no premises at all, and the Court therefore held that it was not locally situate out of the United Kingdom. . . . [After referring to the judgment of Esher, M.R. in that case the L. J. continued]. But I do not think that Lord Esher intended these words to apply to a case where property was incident to other property which was tangible and locally situate, and to say that such property so incident was not locally situate. On the contrary, in my judgment, the observations were made in relation to the case which he had to decide.—p. 296.

COLLINS, L.J.—It is obvious from that decision [Smelting Co. of Australia v. Inland Revenue Commissioners] that it is not the place where the right is exercised is the test whether the right has a local situation. . . . There [West London Syndicate v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (supra)] the majority of the Court held that the goodwill of the business of a hotel proprietor was severable and severed from the hotel in which it was carried on, and to which prima facie it might seem to be annexed. They gathered this from the document in which the different subject-matters of the sale were set out and sold. And although on the face of the document the "lease and goodwill" were measured together at one lump sum, the Court nevertheless arrived at the conclusion that the goodwill was severed from the premises, and allowed the duty to be charged accordingly. It seems at first sight difficult to distinguish that case from the present, because here the goodwill is separately named in the agreement as one of the subject-matters sold; but when that case is looked into more closely it will be seen that the vendor there was the tenant of the leasehold premises, to which prima facie the goodwill might be thought to be annexed, and that, not having the right to assign the premises without the consent of his landlord, he had not in fact assigned them at all, but had put himself under an obligation to constitute some person a trustee of them for the purchaser of the goodwill. So there was in that case technically and strictly a sale of the goodwill apart from the premises. But in the case before us there is one lump sum charged for the sale of the premises on which the business is carried on, and for the other subject-matters comprised in the sale. They are all sold for one lump sum, and it is clear that prima facie the goodwill is annexed to the premises, and there is nothing on the face of the document to suggest that it is not. Therefore we have in this case that element which was wanting both in Smelting Co. of Australia v. Inland Revenue Commissioners and in West London Syndicate v. Inland Revenue Commissioners—namely, that this right of goodwill, which would be incorporeal if it were not annexed to something, is absolutely annexed to a hereditament situate out of the United Kingdom.—p. 297.

V. WILLIAMS, L.J.—It was said that the effect of the decision [Smelting Co. of Australia v. Inland Revenue Commissioners] was that nothing could have a local situation unless it was a physical, tangible thing. I do not agree. The observations made in that case, which it was said had that effect, were appropriate to the case then to be decided. . . . With regard to West London Syndicate v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, I would point out that in that case it was held that the goodwill of the business was not only severable from the leasehold premises on which it was carried on, but had been severed by the conduct of the parties. At the time of that decision, I had the misfortune to differ from the other members of the Court, because I thought that whatever the parties had done intending to sever the goodwill from the leasehold of the hotel, as they had not expressly done so, we ought not to hold that they had done so, because on looking at the lease, which was produced, it contained a contract not to carry on business elsewhere than on the leasehold premises. I thought that to infer in those circumstances that the parties intended to sever the goodwill for the purposes of their contract was to infer that they intended to commit a breach of contract, when there was another construction open to us.—p. 298.

A. L. SMITH, M.R.—I cannot distinguish the present case from that of Smelting Co. of Australia v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, in which this Court held that an agreement for the sale of a licence to use an Australian patent—that is, of the benefit of a contract—was not an agreement for the sale of property locally situated out of the United Kingdom. It is true that in Muller & Co.'s Margarine v. Inland Revenue Commissioners we held in this Court that goodwill which was attached to a manufactory situated abroad was property locally situated out of the United Kingdom, and therefore not within sect. 59 of the Stamp Act, 1891; but we did not, nor indeed could we, dissent from Smelting Co. of Australia v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, theretofore decided, for we were bound by it. The learned judges in the Q. B. Division were of opinion that the case of Muller & Co.'s Margarine v. Inland Revenue Commissioners decided the present, but in my opinion it did not; for the sale of a goodwill attached to premises abroad is very different from the sale of merely the benefit of a contract, which is the present case.—p. 214.

ESHER, M.R.—The expression "marketable security" has been judicially explained by Lord Shand in *Texas Land and Cattle Co. v. That definition, which I adopt, has been satisfied in the present case, and I have no doubt that this instrument is a marketable security, and liable as such to the higher duty.—p. 600.

COTTON, L.J.—In Evans v. Prothero a receipt was admitted, although not duly stamped, as evidence of a contract, not as anything that required a stamp under the Act of Parliament, but as something that did not require a stamp under that Act. Here, if this is required by the purchaser, it must be required as something that does require a stamp, and the stamp it bears is not sufficient. So in the case of the document which contained an assent to a certain deed [Rutty v. Benthall, see post]. It was not required as a deed or power of attorney, but simply to prove the written assent to what had been done.—p. 12. And see "EVIDENCE," vol. i., col. 1038.

PEARSON, J.—I think this is a totally different case from Whiting to Loomes. In that case the deed which was left unstamped was a mortgage deed, and as I gather from the judgment of Jessel, M.R., it was a mortgage for a term. The deed was a valid mortgage deed which had been acted upon, and you could not make the mortgagee a party to the conveyance without being obliged to show subsequently why he was there and what his interest was. Not only so, but the M.R. expressly said that the purchaser had a right to be able to use the term afterwards, if necessary, as a protection to him. As I understand the decision of the M.R. it went mainly upon this, not only that the mortgage was a valid deed, but that it might possibly, and not improbably, be of use to the purchaser, and that he was entitled to have it as a shelter in case any mischief should arise afterwards. I do not find anything different in the judgments of the C.A.; they seemed to have endorsed what the M.R. had to have adopted his line of argument, and to have confirmed his decision on the grounds upon which he based it. In the present case I find nothing of the same kind.—p. 124.

ARCHIBALD, J.—Gwillim v. Daniel and Leeming v. Snaith . . . related to the sale of goods; and in the former case the words "say from 1,000 to 1,200 gallons" were regarded as mere words of expectation; but in the latter case it was held that the words "say not less than 100 packs" were not mere words of expectation, but amounted to a contract. The nature of the subject-matter must be considered in determining what meaning is to be attributed to such expressions. The cases with regard to the sale of goods do not throw much light on the present case. This contract is for the charter of a ship, and the relative positions of the charterer and the shipowner must be considered. The charterer can hardly be expected to be so well aware of the capacity of the vessel as the shipowner. Taking this into consideration, I come to the conclusion that the words "say about" in this charter are not words of expectation but of contract.—p. 158.

Hydraulic Engineering Co. v. McHaffie (1878) 4 Q. B. D. 670; 27 W. R. 221.—C.A.

BRAMWELL, L.J.—The defendants contend that this contract is to be construed as if it merely bound them to deliver the gun "as soon as possible;" and it was upon this ground that the judgment of Field, J. proceeded: but the defendants in effect contend that these words must be construed as meaning "as soon as I possibly can." I cannot agree with this argument: to do a thing "as soon as possible" means to do it within a reasonable time, with an undertaking to do it in the shortest practicable time. In Attwood v. Emery the expressions of eminent judges seem to favour a different view as to the construction of the words "as soon as possible." . . . Every customer knows at the time of giving the order that the manufacturer or tradesman may have other orders on hand; and I do not think that Attwood v. Emery goes further than this, and it does not seem to me to be a decision against the plaintiffs. If, however, it is an authority in favour of the defendants, I cannot agree with it.—p. 673.

BRETT, L.J.—I do not think that Attwood v. Emery decided anything which cannot be fully PARKE, B.—Hawes v. Forster underwent much discussion in the King's Bench when I was a member of that Court, and there was some difference of opinion between the judges, but ultimately, it went down for a new trial, in order to ascertain whether there was any usage or custom of trade which makes the broker's note evidence of the contract. In that case there was a signed entry in the book, which incorporated the terms, making the contract void in the event of the non-arrival of the goods within a certain time. The bought and sold notes which were delivered to the parties, omitted that clause. Certainly it was the impression of part of the Court, that the contract entered in the book was the original contract, and that the bought and sold notes did not constitute the contract. The jury found that the bought and sold notes were evidence of the contract, but on the ground . . . that the bought and sold notes, being delivered to each of the parties after signing the entry in the book, constituted evidence of a new contract made between the parties on the footing of those notes. That case may be perfectly correct; but it does not decide, that if the bought and sold notes disagree, or there be a memorandum in the book made according to the intention of the parties, that that memorandum, signed by the broker, would not be good evidence to satisfy the Statute of Frauds. However, it is not necessary to pronounce a decided opinion on that part of the case, because I think, if there has been a delivery, it is clear it was a delivery in pursuance of the contract of the broker, and then it would bind the parties within the statute.—p. 304.

BLACKBURN, J. (for the Court).—It is right, in order to avoid misapprehension, to say that the phrase, repeatedly used by the counsel for the plaintiff, that the vendor has a right to follow the goods is, in our opinion, calculated to mislead. There are cases, such as that of Wilson v. Hart, to which such a phrase would be applicable, but these, as is pointed out in 2 Sm. L. C. (5th ed., p. 332), proceed on the ground of fraud. In the absence of fraud, unless the person receiving the goods is a party to the contract on which the goods were sold, the vendor has no right to follow them.—p. 257.

SELBORNE, L.C.—My lords, you are asked in this case to review the decision of the Court of C.P. in 1864, in Jolly v. Rees, the correctness of which, as far as I know, has not been seriously controverted since that time. The point determined was one of much importance; namely, that the question, whether a wife has authority to pledge her husband's credit, is to be treated as one of fact, upon the circumstances of each particular case, whatever may be the presumption arising from any particular state of circumstances.—p. 31.

LORD BLACKBURN, who also discussed and approved of Jolly v. Rees, said: The case in Ireland [Moylan v. Nolan] . . . seems, as far as I could see by a slight glance, to be a case where the husband had assented to the contracts in such a way that he could not deny them afterwards. With that we have nothing at present to do.—p. 37.

LORD WATSON also approved of Jolly v. Rees.

PARKE, B.—I have always entertained considerable doubt and suspicion as to the correctness of Lord Tenterden's doctrine in Bryan v. Lewis; it excited a good deal of surprise in my mind at the time, and, when examined, I think it is untenable. I cannot see what principle of law is at all affected by a man's being allowed to contract for the sale of goods, of which he has not possession at the time of the bargain, and has no reasonable expectation of receiving. Such a contract does not amount to a wager, inasmuch as both the contracting parties are not cognisant of the fact that the goods are not in the vendor's possession; and even if it were a wager, it is not illegal, because it has no necessary tendency to injure third parties. The dictum of Lord Tenterden certainly was not a hasty observation thrown out by him, because it appears from Lorymer v. Smith (post, col. 2982) that he had entertained and expressed similar notions four years before. He did not, indeed, in that case, say that such a contract was void, only that it was of a kind not to be encouraged; and the strong opinion he afterwards expressed appears to have gradually formed in his mind during the interval, and was no doubt confirmed by the effects of the unfortunate mercantile speculations throughout the country about that time. There is no indication in any of the books of such a doctrine having ever been promulgated from the bench until Lorymer v. Smith in the year 1822; and there is no case which has since been decided on that authority. Not only, then, was the doubt expressed by Bosanquet, J., in Wells v. Porter well founded, but the doctrine is clearly contrary to law.—p. 466. See Sale of Goods Act, 1893, s. 15 (2) (c).

Forster v. Rowland (1861) 7 H. & N. 103; 30 L. J. Ex. 396.—EX.

MARTIN, B.—I agree with the Court of C. P. in Bailey v. Sweeting, that all that the statute requires is written evidence of the contract, and that there may be a note or memorandum of the contract, sufficient to satisfy the statute, which when written was not intended to operate as a contract. But the memorandum must be "signed by the party, or by his agent lawfully authorised."—p. 107.

CHANNELL, B.—That case merely decided that where one of the parties to a contract has stated in writing the particulars of it, that statement may be evidence against him sufficient to satisfy the statute, though in the same writing he repudiates his liability. But this case is distinguishable: in Bailey v. Sweeting, the document was not in the nature of a proposal. Here the parties were still negotiating when the letter of the 18th May was written, and, therefore, the principle which governed Bailey v. Sweeting has no application.—p. 108.

STIRLING, L.J.—It is no doubt necessary that the note or memorandum to satisfy the statute must show who the parties to the agreement are, but they need not be named or specifically described as such; it is sufficient if, by reasonable intendment, it can be inferred from the document who they are—see *Newell v. WILLES, J.—I own I have considerable difficulty in understanding Vandenbergh v. Spooner;

the meaning, however, seems to be that in a document worded, "D. Spooner agrees to buy the whole of the lots of marble purchased by J. Vandenberg, and now lying at Lyne Cobb, at one shilling per foot," the Court construed the words "purchased by J. Vandenberg," to be an indication or description of the marble sold, and not of the seller. That seems to be an extreme case.—p. 2.

CROMPTON, J.—Graham v. Musson turned on the nature of the signature by the clerk when he signed his own name: he did not sign the name of the defendant Musson, and in signing his own name he meant to sign as his employer's, the plaintiff's, agent, and not as the defendant's. If he had signed Musson's name the case would have been within the authority of Bird v. Boulter (post, col. 2938), and it may be that even as it was there was evidence to go to the jury.—p. 343.

BRAMWELL, B.—It was held in that case [Durrell v. Evans] that the factor signed the paper on behalf of the buyer, and that this paper was intended to be a memorandum of the contract. I said in the Court below, not that the memorandum was an invoice, but that I could not see how the factor was authorized to sign on behalf of the buyer, but the Ex. Ch. thought that there was evidence that the defendant meant the paper to be a memorandum of the contract. What they had to consider was, whether the paper before them had the defendant's name written upon it by an agent on his behalf. And they thought that there was evidence that the factor was the agent of the buyer, because the buyer took a share in the preparation of the contract, and said, in effect, to the factor, "Write it down in such a way." If that decision is wrong, it is wrong in deciding that what the factor was asked to do made him the agent of the buyer, whereas it might be said that the buyer was only suggesting a correction to him, and treating him as the agent of the seller.—p. 128.

PIGOTT, B. to the same effect.

POLLOCK, B.—Therefore the present case is not within this exceptional rule. The case to which it has the nearest analogy is that of Durrell v. Evans, and it is remarkable that when that case came before the Court of Ex., Lord Penzance seems to have drawn the conclusion that what was done was nothing more than what occurs in making out and giving an invoice. I am bound to say that I agree with his reasoning, and I will apply it to the present case. I think Durrell v. Evans can only be supported if it decides that the agency did not commence till after the memorandum was written out, and that will distinguish it from the facts before us.—p. 131.

DENMAN, C.J.—I think this case is distinguishable from Wright v. Dannah and Farebrother v. Simmons; and it appears to me that the clerk was not acting merely as an automaton, but as a person known to all engaged in the sale, and employed by any who told him to put down his name.—p. 446.

TAUNTON, J.—I very much agree with my brother Littledale as to the difficulty in Farebrother v. Simmons. But there is no necessity to overrule that case. The C. J. there says, in the close of his judgment: "Wright v. Dannah fortifies the conclusion at which I have arrived, viz., that the agent contemplated by the legislature, who is to bind a defendant by his signature, must be some third person, and not the other contracting party on the record." It is a sufficient distinction between that case and this, that in the former the auctioneer, whose signature was relied upon, was the party suing; here the signature is by a third person. I would, however, go farther than this.—p. 447.

BLACKBURN, J.—The ordinary usage is for the auctioneer to sign, and he generally does, still if the auctioneer had a sales ledger in which all the conditions of sale were copied out, and were to sign that, such a signature might be binding. It is, however, quite clear that such a signature, if made by the auctioneer's clerk, would not under ordinary circumstances be binding, although there may be circumstances in which it would, such as those in Bird v. Boulter, where there was evidence that the clerk was seen by all the parties to make the entries. But here there is nothing to show that the sales ledger was open or known to the bidders, and upon inspection it appears that there are ciphers in it, which would seem to show that it was not so known. The defendant's clerk in fact was signing for his master's information, not as agent for the bidders. However, even supposing that the clerk had authority to bind the bidder by his signature, I can find no sufficient reference in the sales ledger to the conditions of sale. In Hinde v. Whitehouse (supra, col. 2938), it is said by Lord Ellenborough that "the mere writing on the catalogue, not being by any reference incorporated with the conditions of sale, is not a memorandum of a bargain under those conditions of sale."—p. 54. STIRLING, L.J.—It is also established as regards many of the contracts within sects. 4 and 17 [Statute of Frauds], that the note or memorandum referred to in these sections need not be contemporaneous with the contract, but is sufficient if it comes into existence before the commencement of the action to enforce the contract; see Bill v. Bament (11 L. J. Ex. 81; 9 M. & W. 36, supra, col. 2933); Bailey v. Sweeting (30 L. J. C. P. 150; 9 C. B. (N.S.) 843, supra, col. 2933); and Lucas v. Dixon. These decisions are based on the language of the statute. . . . In Lucas v. Dixon it is pointed out by Fry, L.J., that, where the plaintiff wishes to avail himself of a memorandum which comes into existence after the commencement of the action, he can only do so by discontinuing the action and commencing another. So that a memorandum coming into existence after the commencement of the action is only available if the plaintiff is in a position to discontinue. The note or memorandum need not be given for valuable consideration, nor have any particular form; a letter by the party sought to be charged to a third party—Bailey v. Sweeting, and Gibson v. Holland; an affidavit—Barkworth v. Young (26 L. J. Ch. 153; 4 Drew. 1); and even a will—Hoyle, In re, Hoyle v. Hoyle—have each been accepted by the Courts as sufficient.—p. 526.

 DR. LUSHINGTON for self, BUCOLEUGH (DUKE), LORD BROUGHAM, and KNIGHT BRUCE, V.-C.; T. P. LEIGH dissenting.—In Rowe v. Osborne the note delivered to the vendor was actually signed by the purchaser; the note or contract afterwards sent to the purchaser differed from it. Lord Ellenborough held that the note signed by the purchaser constituted the real contract. The principle, upon which Lord Ellenborough so ruled, is not stated, but we apprehend it must have been this, that the signature clearly evidenced the consent of the purchaser to buy on the terms stated in the document. . . . Here, the note received no signature from the party.—p. 249.

 WILLES, J.—As to custom to contract by bought and sold notes in this trade, there was no evidence; the case, therefore, does not fall strictly within that of Cowie v. Remfry, to which I referred in the course of the argument. Had it done so, I should have been prepared to say that I agree with the dissenting judge, and not with the other members of the judicial committee who pronounced that judgment. I apprehend, that, if that case had come before a common law court, it would have been decided in conformity with the decision of the Supreme Court. It never could have been held by a court accustomed to deal with commercial matters, where a document in writing had been assented to by the seller and corrected and initialled by the buyer, that, because a subsequent note was delivered somewhat differing from the former, therefore there was no contract between the parties. I cannot consent, with all respect for so high a tribunal, to be bound by that decision.—p. 310. ERLE, C.J. and BYLES, J. concurred.

BOWEN, L.J.—The cases on the Statute of Frauds can have nothing to do with it [Companies Act, 1867, s. 25], and it would not follow because the documents would be held to be a contract or memorandum within the Statute of Frauds, that therefore it is a contract which fulfils the requirements of a different section in a different Act. Reuss v. Picksley and . . . Smith v. Neale (supra) were not decisions that the document amounted to a contract, but only that it amounted to the memorandum of a contract. We are bound by Reuss v. Picksley, and that no doubt pushed the literal construction of the Statute of Frauds to a limit beyond which it would, perhaps, not be easy to go; but unless we found the language of the Statute of Frauds repeated in this section, we should not be bound by Reuss v. Picksley; and if we were to follow it, we should be following that which has not a real analogy.—p. 129.

ERLE, C.J.—Both in Richards v. Porter and Cooper v. Smith, the letters complain of the goods not being in time, and the defendants there said, there is another term which has not been fulfilled, so that there was clearly a term of the contract in dispute; and in both those cases there were two writings of two different contracts. So, again, in Smith v. Surman (supra, col. 2942), the defendant alleged that there was another term in the contract, viz., that the trees should be sound and good; and in Archer v. Baynes, that the flour ought to have been according to sample. So that in all these cases a necessity arose for oral evidence to determine the dispute.—p. 225.

Rickard v. Moore (1878) 38 L. T. 841.—C.A. BRAMWELL, BAGGALLAY and THESIGER, L.JJ.

BRAMWELL, L.J.—It is said that this case cannot be distinguished from Kibble v. Gough. If that were so, I should be inclined to say that Kibble v. Gough was wrongly decided. But I think there are several points of difference between the two cases. In Kibble v. Gough, the jury found that there was in fact an acceptance of the goods by the defendant. The goods were brought in a waggon to the defendant's place of business. His foreman looks at them, and takes them in, adding that they are "not equal to sample." If the defendant himself had been there the result would have been the same. The goods were actually taken out of the plaintiff's cart and received and put in the defendant's premises, with what hardly amounted to more than a grumble on the foreman's part; more goods were sent the next day, and were also taken in, and the second and a third instalment received. It is impossible to say that was a case in which the jury might not find that there was sufficient evidence of acceptance to take the case out of the Statute of Frauds, though possibly there was not sufficient evidence of acceptance to prevent the defendant's objections to the goods as not equal to sample. To show that, it is quite enough to read the judgment of Cotton, L.J.—p. 842.

BRETT, M.R.—The counsel for the defendant placed reliance on the case of Richard v. Moore. It is alleged that in that case Lord Bramwell doubted the correctness of what he had said in the previous case of Kibble v. Gough. However that may be, it is quite clear that that case cannot overrule Kibble v. Gough.—p. 232.

BAGGALLAY, L.J.—When Richard v. Moore comes to be examined, there are various points of difference which are adverted to in the judgments, and there is also the most important distinction adopted by Thesiger, L.J., in giving judgment, namely, that whereas in Kibble v. Gough the jury found that the goods were equal to sample, in Richard v. Moore the jury found that they were not equal to sample.—Ib.

Taylor v. Smith (1892) [1893] 2 Q. B. 65; 61 L. J. Q. B. 331; 67 L. T. 39; 40 W. R. 486.—C.A. LORD HERSCHELL, LINDLEY and KAY, L.JJ.

LORD HERSCHELL.—"Acceptance" is not used in the statute according to its common acceptation, and in what sense it is used has never been determined. The plaintiffs in support of the view that there has been an acceptance, rely on Morton v. Tibbett (15 Q. B. 423, supra, col. 2943), and . . . Kibble v. Gough and Page v. Morgan. In the two latter cases, the action was tried by a jury, and the question before the C. A. was not whether there had been an acceptance, but whether there was evidence of acceptance to go to the jury, and the Court held that there was. Page v. Morgan was most relied on, where the law was laid down by Bowen, L.J., in these terms: "Having regard to the mischief, at which the statute was aimed, it would appear a natural conclusion that the acceptance contemplated by the statute was such a dealing with the goods as amounts to a recognition of the contract." In that case the goods, which consisted of bags of flour, had been taken in part into the defendant's mill, and he there opened some of them for examination. It was held that there was evidence to go to the jury that he had accepted the goods. In the present case, the question is not whether there was evidence on which a jury might find acceptance, but whether the judge was wrong in finding that there had not been an acceptance. . . . In Page v. Morgan, the purchaser had some of the sacks taken into his mill; here the goods were only landed at Kenworthy's wharf, and the defendant gave no directions as to dealing with them. In Page v. Morgan, after some of the sacks had been taken into the defendant's mill, the defendant there opened them. In the present case, all that appears is that the goods were at the carrier's wharf, and the defendant there looked at them.—p. 71.

BIGHAM J.—That case [Taylor v. Smith] was dealt with by the Court as merely involving a question of fact. This appears from an examination of the judgments. I see by a foot note that the case was reported about a year after it was decided "in deference to representations from various quarters." I think the editor would have done well to have resisted those representations, for the case declares no principle of law, and is, in my opinion, of no general application.—p. 502.

CAMPBELL, C.J. (for the Court).—Howe v. Palmer . . . we clearly think was well decided, although we cannot concur in all the reasons given for the decision. There, the only evidence of acceptance and receipt was, that the agent of the vendor who had verbally sold to the defendant twelve bushels of tares, part of a larger quantity in the vendor's possession, had measured off twelve bushels of the tares and set them apart for the purchaser. According to the contract, they were to remain in the possession of the vendor till called for. The purchaser, therefore, neither had accepted nor received the goods.—p. 385.

left to the jury, whether or not there was an acceptance of the hay by the defendant, and they have found that there was, which puts an end to any question of law. BIGHAM, J.—As to Nicholson v. Bower, it was an issue to try whether certain wheat was the property of the plaintiff, who was the assignee of one Pavitt, a bankrupt, or the property of the defendant, who had sold the wheat to Pavitt. Pavitt had not complied with the requirements of the statute, so that the contract of sale never was enforceable against him; and it seems to have been decided that on this ground there was no binding contract between the vendor and the vendee, and that therefore the property never legally vested in the buyer. If that is the true ground of the decision I do not think it was right; nor do I think it is in accordance with the later cases decided under the statute. The seller had sold the goods and was clearly bound by the contract; and the buyer had bought the goods, although he could not be sued for the price if he chose to insist upon the statutory defence. In such circumstances, it would not be true to say that the property had not passed. I think, however, upon a careful examination of the facts of the case, the decision may be justified on the supposition that before the assignee's title could be said to have arisen the vendor and vendee had rescinded the contract, so that the property had reverted in the former; and this appears to have been the ground upon which the judgment of Erle, J., proceeded.—p. 503.

BLACKBURN, J.—In Rhodes v. Thwaites, HOBROLD, J., lays down what is the principle: he says, "I am of opinion that the selection of the sixteen hogsheads by the plaintiff, and the adoption of that act by the defendant, converted that which before was a mere agreement to sell into an actual sale, and the property in the sugars passed to the defendant." But that property passes by virtue of the previous agreement. It relates back to the previous contract, which was made out of market overt, because it was made in another place; and in the present case it was made out of market overt, because the goods were not there present.—p. 231.

WRIGHT, J.—It seems to me that the case is within the principle of Cundy v. Lindsay, and that Baillie is entitled to repudiate on the ground that there was no contract between him and the company. The circumstances show that there was not a contract which was voidable on the ground of misrepresentations made to him, but something which was void ab initio—in other words, no contract at all. . . . The only remaining point, assuming I am right on the first point, is whether the observations in Cundy v. Lindsay apply in the case where the contract as here is in writing. It is said that in such a case a person cannot deny that there is a contract, but in Cundy v. Lindsay there appears to have been a so-called contract in writing; but whether that is so or not, in my judgment the principle of that case applies. Here there is not a contract in writing, because there never was a contract at all—a consensus ad idem. The so-called contract was only part of the machinery to defraud.—p. 83.

MELLISH, L.J. (for self, BRETT and AMPHLETT, J.J.A.).—The Q. B. D. [Lindsay v. Cundy

(supra)] held that the action could not be maintained, on the ground that there was a sale of the handkerchiefs by the plaintiffs to Blenkarn, which could not be set aside as against the defendants, who were bonâ fide purchasers from Blenkarn without notice of his fraud, and that the case was not within 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 100. In giving judgment Blackburn, J., says: "The first question that arises is one of fact, were these goods, which were originally the property of the plaintiffs, Messrs. Lindsay & Co., obtained from them by fraud, so that the property passed from them under a contract, though a contract under certain circumstances liable to be avoided; or did the property never pass from the plaintiffs at all? Upon that question reliance was placed on Hardman v. Booth, and that case unquestionably lays down very good law. The question for us is whether the facts are the same, and whether we ought to draw the same inference from the facts that the Ct. of Ex. did in Hardman v. Booth. That case lays down the law, that where a person has sold goods to A.B., or has been led to believe that he has sold them to A.B., and delivered them as he supposes to A.B., and the person who has led him into that belief receives and carries off the goods and disposes of them to another—there has not been a selling to the person who fraudulently represents himself to be a servant or agent of the supposed purchaser, A.B., and he cannot confer a good title on anyone else, the property never having been vested in him." We entirely agree with this statement of the law, but we cannot agree with the conclusion which the Court below has drawn from the facts. The true result of the facts seems to us to be that Blenkarn falsely pretended that the firm writing the letters and ordering the goods was the well-known firm of Blenkiron & Sons, and that the plaintiffs believing this pretence to be true, and that they were delivering the goods to the well-known firm of Blenkiron & Sons, delivered them to Blenkarn; and if this is a correct description of the facts the case is brought directly within the rule established by Hardman v. Booth.—p. 99.

LORD O'HAGAN, after discussing Aldridge v. Johnson and Langton v. Higgins, continued: It seems to me that these cases, if they were well decided, and I see no reason to call their authority in question, go far to sustain the view of the Court of C.P. on the point I am considering. They establish that the filling of the sacks and bottles amounted to an appropriation of their contents to the persons to whom they respectively belonged. And they establish farther, that, in the case of a partial delivery, although all the goods, which are the subject of an integral contract, have not been delivered, there may, in certain circumstances, be such an appropriation of a portion as to pay the property in it. According to Lord Campbell [in Aldridge v. Johnson], at the moment when the barley was put into the sacks, "the property in each sackful vested," that is, there was a successive vesting, sack by sack; and whether one only, or a hundred, had been filled, the contents of each of them passed eo instanti to the purchaser. Bramwell, B. [in Langton v. Higgins] gives a reading on this decision in his own judgment, and applies it to demonstrate that "though only a portion of the oil had been put into the bottles," and "the plaintiff was not bound to take a part only," nevertheless it vested either conclusively or on the exercise of the option.—pp. 739, 740.

BLACKBURN, J.—No doubt it was provided that the defendant should pay for the rice on the ship's arrival, and according to what was delivered and paid out. And it is quite clear here, that the ship and cargo having gone to the bottom of the sea, neither of those things can come to pass. In Fragano v. Long and Alexander v. Gardner (supra, col. 2959) it was held that this did not matter, but that if the property did perish before the time for payment came (the time being dependant upon delivery), and the delivery was prevented by the destruction of the property, the defendant must pay a sum equivalent.—p. 46.

SELBORNE, L.C.—In the present case, I see no reason to doubt that the difficulty arising from the confusion of parcels—material only to the settlement of the amounts payable by the plaintiff to his two vendors—if not solved by consent (or by arbitration, for which each contract provided) would have been soluble by principles of law, applied to the facts and to the terms of the contract. The necessity for doing this, and the fact that it had not been done at the time of the loss, do not, in my opinion, sufficiently distinguish the case from Browne v. Hare and the earlier authorities to the same effect. The goods were, by the act of the vendors, separated from the bulk of all other goods belonging to them; they were shipped "free on board" in what (for that purpose) was the purchaser's ship, under two contracts so to deliver them.—p. 267.

Dunkin*, that whatever the rule may be between buyer and seller, it is clear a defendant cannot say to a plaintiff, "The property is not yours," after acknowledging to hold it to his account, apply strictly to the question before us.—p. 54.

JAMES, L.J.—The point has been the subject of decision over and over again, and the rule seems to me to have been most accurately expressed by Best, J. in Hawes v. Watson. He says: It appears to me, too, that if we consider the principle upon which the right of stoppage in transitu is founded, it cannot extend to such a case as the present. The vendee has the legal right to the goods the moment the contract is executed, but there still exists in the vendor an equitable right to stop them in transitu, which he may exercise at any time before the goods get actually into the possession of the vendee, provided the exercise of that right does not interfere with the rights of third persons.—p. 634.

FARWELL, J.—The proposition which is advanced in Knights v. Wiffen and referred to in Foster v. Tyne Pontoon and Dry Docks Co. (supra) comes, I think, to this—if the broker is insolvent at the date of action brought, then it lies on the defendant to show that no money ever could have been recovered against him, and that consequently the plaintiff has not suffered by resting on his position. I think that is what Blackburn, J., meant in Knights v. Wiffen when he said, "If the plaintiff had been met by a refusal on the part of the defendant, he could have gone to Maris"—the bankrupt—"and have demanded back his money; very likely he might not have derived much benefit if he had done so, but he had a right to do it." Collins, J., in Foster v. Tyne Pontoon, &c. Co., referring to Blackburn, J.'s decision, says: "No doubt in Knights v. Wiffen it was assumed that there was prejudice to the plaintiff, though no evidence appears to have been given at the trial as to the solvency of the plaintiff's vendor at the date of the representation; but I think that this must be treated as an inference of fact, and not of law." As I understand that, he meant that the onus of proof to the contrary must have rested on the defendant.—p. 505.

CHANNELL, B. (for the Court).—In Hanson v. Meyer (6 East 614; see post), the weighing was to precede the delivery, and was a condition precedent to the purchaser's right to take possession and to a complete present right of property. . . . In Rugg v. Minett a duty remained to be performed by the sellers, and Lord Ellenborough stated the test to be, whether everything had been done by the sellers which lay upon them to perform in order to put the goods in a deliverable state; and Bayley, J., in effect, adopted the same test. Zagury v. Furnell is an authority to the same effect. There it was the duty of the seller to count the skins in each bale, and the price was a certain sum per dozen skins.—p. 46.

CAMPBELL, C.J.—I do not think it necessary to inquire what the law would be in the absence of an express warranty. On that point the law is not in a satisfactory state. The decision in Morley v. Attenborough was that a pawnbroker, selling an unredeemed pledge as such, did not warrant the title of the pawnor. Of that decision I approve: but a great many questions, beyond the mere decision, arise on the very able judgment of the learned Baron in that case, which I fear must remain open to controversy. It may be that the learned Baron is correct in saying that, on a sale of personal property, the maxim of caveat emptor does by the law of England apply: but if so there are many exceptions stated in the judgment which well-nigh eat up the rule. Executory contracts are said to be excepted: so are sales in retail shops, or where there is a usage of trade: so that there may be difficulty in finding cases to which the rule would practically apply.—p. 290.

SIR J. COLVILLE (for the P.C.).—The law of England as to implied warranty of title in chattels sold was until lately, if it is not still, in some uncertainty. The more modern cases are collected by Mr. Benjamin in his work on Sales, 2nd Ed., pp. 511 et seq. In Sims v. Marryat, Lord Campbell, when commenting on Parke, B.'s judgment in Morley v. Attenborough, after saying that the law was not in a satisfactory state, observed [see extract, supra, col. 2967]. One of the latest expositions of the law on this point is to be found in Eichholz v. Bannister, which was decided in 1864. In that case Erle, C.J., is reported to have said: “I decide, in accordance with the current of authorities, that if the vendor of a chattel at the time of the sale either by words affirms that he is the owner, or by his conduct gives the purchaser to understand that he is such owner, then it forms part of the contract, and if it turns out in fact that he is not the owner the consideration fails, and the money so paid by the purchaser can be recovered back.” This passage, it is to be observed, although contained in the report in the Law Journal, is not to be found, tutidem verbis, in the regular report. The actual decision, however, in which all the judges concurred, was that on the sale of goods in an open shop or warehouse there is an implied warranty on the part of the seller that he is the owner of the goods, and if it turns out otherwise the buyer may recover back the price as money paid as on a consideration that has failed. A rule of this kind cannot, of course, be applied to a sale of goods by the sheriff under a fi. fa., because what the sheriff professes to sell is only the right, title, and interest, whatever that may be, of the judgment debtor, and this was the express ground of the decision in Chapman v. Speller where the case is treated as an exception to the general rule. It would seem, however, that, even according to the principles laid down in Morley v. Attenborough, which, of the modern cases, is most favourable to the application of the maxim cuveat emptor, the sheriff may reasonably be held to undertake by his conduct that he is acting within his jurisdiction. In that case, though it was decided that on a sale by a pawnbroker of an article pawned with him as an unredeemed pledge there is no implied warranty of the pawnor's title, the judgment of Parke, B. seems to assume that the pawnbroker does warrant that the article has been pledged with him, and has become irredeemable. The learned judge says: "In our judgment it appears unreasonable to consider the pawnbroker, from the nature of his occupation, as undertaking anything more than that the subject of sale is a pledge, and irredeemable, and that he is not cognizant of any defect of title to it." So, too, it may be inferred from Hall v. Conder (26 L. J. C. P. 138; 2 C. B. (N.S.) 22, see post, col. 2978) that although upon the sale of a patent there is no implied warranty that the patent is valid and indefeasible, it would be reasonable to hold that there is an implied warranty that letters patent for the alleged invention have been regularly issued under the Great Seal. Their lordships think that upon a similar principle the sheriff may be held to undertake by his conduct that he has seized and put up for sale the property sold in the exercise of his jurisdiction; although when he has jurisdiction he does not in any way warrant that the judgment debtor has a good title to it, or guarantee that the purchaser shall not be turned out of possession by some person other than the judgment debtor.—p. 126.

LORD HERSCHELL.—It was laid down in Jones v. Bright (post, col. 2973), that where goods are ordered of a manufacturer for a particular purpose, he implied by warrants that the goods he supplies are fit for that purpose. This view in law has been constantly acted upon from the time of that decision. . . . It is equally well settled that upon a sale of goods of a specified description, which the purchaser has no opportunity of examining before the sale, the goods must not only answer the specific description, but must be merchantable under that description. This doctrine was laid down in Jones v. Just, where all previous authorities on the point were reviewed. In Mody v. Gregson (see post, col. 2980) the decision in Jones v. Just was approved of and acted upon, and it was further held that the implied warranty that the goods supplied are merchantable was not absolutely excluded by the fact that the goods were sold by sample, and that the bulk precisely corresponded with it, but was only excluded as regards those matters which the purchaser might, by due diligence in the use of all ordinary and usual means, have ascertained from an examination of the sample. I think the law enunciated in these cases is sound and not open to doubt.—p. 290.

COLERIDGE, C.J.—There is no doubt that if a manufacturer sells an article which he knows is bought for a particular purpose, he impliedly warrants that it is fit for that particular purpose. That is a principle which was established some sixty years ago in Jones v. Bright (post, col. 2973), and has been acted upon ever since. But the present case is not within that rule, because nothing was mentioned to the seller as to the particular purpose for which this cloth was bought, and there was nothing to fix him with knowledge of that purpose. . . . But then it is said that Drummond v. Van Ingen in the H.L. carries the law further than Jones v. Bright. In my opinion that is not so. There was no intention on the part of the Lords to extend the old rule. Lord Macnaghten expressly said that he did not go beyond it; so also did Lord Selborne. And Lord Herschell, on whose judgment special reliance has been placed, was particularly careful to explain that he did not intend to carry the doctrine farther.—p. 652.

ESHER, M.R.—Then is there any authority which establishes that where goods are ordered by a woollen merchant of a cloth manufacturer the latter must be taken to know that they may be ordered to be sold to tailors? The case referred to in the H.L. is no authority for such a proposition, for there the goods were ordered under the designation of "coatings," which necessarily imported that they were to be made up into coats, and therefore the facts of that case came within the precise terms of the fourth rule in Jones v. Just. . . . The Lords decided that case on the ground that it came within the fourth proposition in Jones v. Just, which proposition they held to be applicable to a case in which the goods were bought by sample. But here there is no evidence to bring the case within that proposition.—p. 655.

Randall v. Newson, considered.

Wallis v. Russell [1902] 2 Ir. R. 585.—C.A. FITZGIBBON, L.J.—Randall v. Newson was the case of a carriage pole, and the Ex. Ch., reversed the Q.B. which had applied between buyer and seller the principle which Readhead's Case (38 L. J. Q. B. 169; L. R. 4 Q. B. 379, see ante, col. 2667) had laid down for carrier and passenger. Brett, L.J., held the seller liable for a defect which "no care or skill could discover," on the general principle that, if the subject-matter of a bargain of purchase and sale be a commercial commodity, the undertaking is that the thing delivered "shall be that commodity, saleable or merchantable."—p. 620.

BRETT, J.A. (for the Court).—In Gray v. Cox, in 1825, the case was decided on a variance; but Abbott, C.J., stated that he was of opinion "that if a person sold a commodity for a particular purpose, he must be understood to warrant it reasonably fit and proper for such purpose." The commodity ordered was copper for sheathing the ship "Coventry." It was proved that no defect could be discovered by inspection of the article, and it was admitted that the defendants were ignorant of the defective quality of the copper. It is obvious that Lord Teuterden did not consider the seller relieved by reason of the defect being latent.—p. 106.

CAIRNS, L.C.—I observe that in . . . Bodger v. Nichols, coming on appeal, I think from a decision of a County Court judge. . . Lord Blackburn (or, as he then was Blackburn, J.) seems to have thrown out an opinion that in a case of that kind, there being nothing upon one side in the shape of statement or negotiation, and there being simply the fact of a man sending diseased animals to a public market to be sold, that must be held to be a representation by conduct that the animals were free from disease, and that the person so sending them might be liable for the consequences of that representation, if it turned out to be untrue. My lords, I repeat that I desire, so far as I am concerned, to hold myself unpledged, if such a case had to be considered. But that, as it seems to me, is not the case which your lordships have now to consider.—p. 22.

LORD O'HAGAN.—The legal result is stated very plainly by Lord Ellenborough in the familiar case of Baglehole v. Walters, the authority of which has never, so far as I know, been called in question: "Where an article is sold with all faults I think it is quite immaterial how many belonged to it within the knowledge of the seller, unless he used some artifice to disguise them, and to prevent their being discovered by the purchaser. The very object of introducing such a stipulation is to put the purchaser on his guard, and to throw upon him the burden of examining all faults, both secret and apparent. . . " Now, the defendant in this case did precisely what was held by Lord Ellenborough to protect a vendor against liability for all faults, "secret or apparent."—p. 27.

 LORD SELBORNE concurred with some reluctance.

 GROVE and LINDLEY, JJ.

GROVE, J.—Budd v. Fairman, is very clearly in point. There the words were, "Received of B. 10% for a grey four-year-old colt, warranted sound," and that was held not to be a warrant that it was four years old. That case cannot be distinguished from the present.—p. 434.

BAYLEY, J.—It is indeed extremely difficult to distinguish this case from Garment v. Barrs, but I must confess that I was never perfectly satisfied with the reasoning of Eyre, C.J., in that case.
 He there lays it down, that in order to constitute a variance, the injury under which the horse laboured must be of a permanent nature, and not one arising from a temporary accident. If that reasoning is correct, the warranty in many cases will be contingent, and will ultimately prove either general or qualified, according as the injury eventually turns out to be permanent or temporary. I think the nature of a warranty cannot depend upon such a question; it must, in my opinion, depend entirely upon the question, what was the understanding and intention of the parties at the time when the contract was made.

HUDDESTON, B.—In Woodin v. Burford . . .
 a distinction is pointed out between the warranty given by a person intrusted to sell an article and that given by one merely intrusted to deliver it, and that in the latter case an express authority to warrant must be shown. . . . In Howard v.
Sheward it was expressly held that the agent or servant of a horse-dealer has an implied authority to bind his principal or master by a warranty, even though (unknown to the buyer)
 he has express orders not to warrant.—p. 621.

Wallis v. Russell [1902] 2 Ir. R. 585.—C.A.
FITZGIBBON, L.J.—Sect. 15 [Sale of Goods Act, 1893] enacts that in "the case of a contract for sale by sample there is an implied condition—(a) that the bulk shall correspond with the sample in quality; (b) that the buyer shall have a reasonable opportunity of comparing the bulk with the sample; and (c) that the goods shall be free from any defect, rendering them unmerchantable which would not be apparent on reasonable examination of the sample." This is the law laid down by Mody v. Gregson, adopted and explained by the H. L. in Drummond v. Van Ingen (supra). If Miss Donovan, finding that boiled crabs only were to be had, had taken a boiled crab as a sample to the plaintiff, and she had sent back for "two crabs like that," the defendant would have been responsible for the undiscoverable defect under s. 15. How can his responsibility under s. 14 (1) be different when she bid him send her "two nice fresh crabs for her tea?"—p. 615.

BRETT, J.A. (for the Court).—It is sufficient to say of it [Parkinson v. Lee] that, either it does not determine the extent of a seller's liability on the contract, or it has been overruled. . . . In Gardiner v. Gray the contract was for the purchase and sale of "waste silk." The silk was imported, and the bulk had not been seen either by the defendant, the seller, or the plaintiff, the buyer. . . . The decision, therefore, is that the commodity offered and delivered must answer the description of it and be saleable waste silk. The principle is that the commodity offered must answer the description of it in the contract.—p. 106.

BOVILL, C.J.—In some cases, however, such as where the goods are utterly valueless, the dealing with them by the purchaser has been held not to affect his right to reject and to refuse to pay anything for them, as in Poulton v. Lattimore, where the purchaser had seen some and sold other parts of certain clover seed, which had been warranted as new growing seed, but the whole of which turned out to be totally unproductive and useless. In determining what is a reasonable time for rejecting the goods, the conduct of the seller may be taken into consideration, as where by a subsequent misrepresentation he has induced the purchaser to prolong the trial.—Adam v. Richards.—p. 235.

COLERIDGE, C.J.—The decision in that case [Couston v. Chapman], so far as I understand it, appears to be perfectly right. . . . All that was meant by it was that there must be some unequivocal act by the purchaser to show that he does not take the goods, and that what was done by the purchaser in that case was very slight, and was not enough for that purpose. It is true that the head note in the report of that case would seem to show that it was the duty of the purchaser when the goods are not conformable to sample to place them in neutral custody, if the vendor does not acquiesce in their being at his risk and disposal, but that does not appear to have formed any part of the judgment, and what the learned lords must have meant by what they said was, that if the purchaser had done that, it would have been an unequivocal act of rejection of the goods by him. Then, in Lucy v. Moufflet, both Martin and Bramwell, B.B. expressly state that it is not necessary for the purchaser to send back the article which he has rejected. In that case there had been a sale of a quantity of cider, and the question was whether the using a larger quantity of it than was necessary for the mere purpose of tasting it had, under the circumstances of that case, taken away the purchaser's right to reject it. The Ct. of Ex. thought that it had not.—p. 206.

Dawson v. Collis (1851) 20 L. J. C. P. 116; 10 C. B. 523, 531; 2 L. M. & P. 14.—C.P.

JERVIS, C.J.—I am inclined to think that the correct principle to be derived from Street v. Blay is, that in the sale of a specific enumerated article, the buyer has no right to say that the article does not correspond with the description given, and, therefore, to repudiate the contract. The remedy in such cases is to bring an action on the warranty, or to get a reduction of damages.—p. 117.

MAULE, J.—I think the principle applied in Street v. Blay ought to be extended, and that it is just and convenient to hold that the proper remedy is that which the parties expressly provide for, namely, an action on the warranty, or a reduction of damages, as in Allen v. Cumeron (2 L. J. Ex. 263; 1 Cr. & M. 832), and in other cases.—p. 118.

GRESSWELL, J.—Where there is a sale of an individual chattel, there the vendee can only defend himself altogether by a cross-action, as in Poulton v. Lattimore (9 B. & C. 259, supra, col. 2984), or partly by a reduction of damages. I apprehend that the rule in Smith's Leading Cases (vol. ii. p. 15) does not mean that Street v. Blay and Poulton v. Lattimore, decided the three points there mentioned, but only that these three points might be inferred from the decision.—p. 118.

The goods sold were "waste silk," "saddles," "copper for sheathing a ship," and "copper pans," yet no one suggested that it was material to particularise the purpose for which they were required further than by making it known to the seller. Street v. Blay (1831) 2 B. & Ad. 456; 36 R. R. 626.—K.B.

TENTERDEN, C.J. (for the Court).—Lord Eldon, in Curtis v. Hannay, is reported to have said, that "he took it to be clear law, that if a person purchases a horse which is warranted sound, and it afterwards turns out that the horse was unsound at the time of the warranty, the buyer might, if he pleased, keep the horse and bring an action on the warranty, in which he would have a right to recover the difference between the value of a sound horse and one with such defects as existed at the time of the warranty; or he might return the horse and bring an action to recover the full money paid; but in the latter case, the seller had a right to expect that the horse should be returned in the same state he was when sold, and not by any means diminished in value;" and he proceeds to say, that if it were in a worse state than it would have been if returned immediately after the discovery, the purchaser would have no defence to an action for the price of the article. It is to be implied that he would have a defence in case it were returned in the same state, and in a reasonable time after the discovery. This dictum has been adopted in Mr. Starkie's excellent work on the Law of Evidence, Part IV., p. 645; and it is there said that a vendee may, in such a case, rescind the contract altogether by returning the article and refuse to pay the price, or recover it back if paid. It is, however, extremely difficult, indeed impossible, to reconcile this doctrine with those cases in which it has been held, that where the property in the specific chattel has passed to the vendee, and the price has been paid, he has no right, upon the breach of the warranty, to return the article and re-vest the property in the vendor, and recover the price as money paid on a consideration which has failed, but must sue upon the warranty, unless there has been a condition in the contract authorising the return, or the vendor has received back the chattel, and has thereby consented to rescind the contract, or has been guilty of a fraud, which destroys the contract altogether.—p. 461.

LORD BLACKBURN.—The rule of law, as I always understood it, is that where there is a contract in which there are two parties, each side having to do something (it is so laid down in the notes to Pordage v. Cole [1 Wms. Saund. 548, ed. 1871]), if you see that the failure to perform one part of it goes to the root of the contract, goes to the foundation of the whole, it is a good defence to say, "I am not going on to perform my part of it when that which is the root of the whole and the substantial consideration for my performance is defeated by your misconduct."—p. 443.

COLLINS, L.J.—Ever since the date of *Pordage v. The object of this clause is to declare that what was contended in former cases is intended in this.—p. 36.

BLACKBURN, J.—The contract in the present case is not exactly the same as in Hoare v. Rennie. I gather from the L. J. R. that the reasons given by Pollock, C.B., and Watson, B., were not very satisfactory to Channell, B. It is difficult to discover what was the principle of the decision (p. 32). Hoare v. Rennie was much observed upon in Jonassohn v. Young. I cannot say that it was overruled, because this Court (the Q. B.) assumed that time was of the essence of the contract. It is difficult to see how they could have done so, and I do not think that I am bound by their decision in Hoare v. Rennie. If we have misunderstood Hoare v. Rennie, our judgment may be corrected by a Court of Error.—p. 33. MELLOR and LUSH, JJ. concurred.

COLERIDGE, C.J.—The Ct. of Ex. thought that in Hoare v. Rennie where time was of the essence of the contract, and where by the non-delivery of part of the goods the whole object of the contract had been frustrated, such non-performance amounted to a rescission of the contract, and set the other party to it free. And that case was so put by the great authority of Crompton, J. in the subsequent case of Jonassohn v. Young, where he says it is to be supported on the ground that the breach frustrated the whole contract. Then in Withers v. Reynolds (supra, col. 2991), where the action was for non-delivery of hay, a non-payment was held to put an end to the contract, because, as was said by Patterson, J., such non-payment was, under the circumstances of that case, an intimation that the purchaser did not intend to complete the contract, and on that ground the case was upheld by Wightman, J. in Jonassohn v. Young.—p. 93.

BRAMWELL, L.J.—Hoare v. Rennie is in point. The same thing was decided a few days ago in Englehart v. Bosanquet [unreported]. It was there held that on a sale of 2,000 tons of sugar to come in two ships when the first ship was not equal to contract, the buyer was not bound to take the other. But it is said that Hoare v. Rennie has been overruled by Simpson v. Crippin (42 L. J. Q. B. 28; L. R. 8 Q. B. 14; see post, col. 2993). That is not so. That decision was quite right. The case was distinguishable from Hoare v. Rennie, for the contract had been part performed and could not therefore be undone. One may express a respectful agreement with what the learned judges said in Simpson v. Crippin, viz., that they did not understand Hoare v. Rennie.—p. 100.

BAGGALLAY, L.J.—If, then, the decision in Simpson v. Crippin is to be considered as conflicting with that in Hoare v. Rennie, and I think it was so considered by the judges who decided it, I am bound to say that I adopt the principles enunciated in the latter case as being more in accordance with reason and justice than those upon which the former was expressed to be decided. . . . I may mention that in Bradford v. Williams (41 L. J. Ex. 164; L. R. 7 Ex. 259; see post, col. 2993), which was decided in the early part of the same year as Simpson v. Crippin, Hoare v. Rennie was quoted and recognised, and the principles upon which it was decided adopted. Bradford v. Williams was mentioned in argument in Simpson v. Crippin, but was not noticed in any of the judgments.—p. 102.

BRETT, J., who dissented, said:—In my opinion Hoare v. Rennie was wrongly decided, and I prefer Simpson v. Crippin.—p. 105.

SELBORNE, L.C.—I am content to take the rule as stated by Lord Coleridge in Freeth v. Burr, which is in substance, as I understand it, that you must look at the actual circumstances of the case in order to see whether the one party to the contract is relieved from its future performance by the conduct of the other; you must examine what that conduct is, so as to see whether it amounts to a renunciation, to an absolute refusal to perform the contract, such as would amount to a rescission if he had the power to rescind, and whether the other party may accept it as a reason for not performing his part.—p. 438.

LORD BLACKBURN.—I myself have no doubt that Withers v. Reynolds [1 L. J. K. B. 30; 2 B. & Ad. 882 (supra, col. 2991)] correctly lays down the law to this extent, that where there is a contract which is to be performed in future, if one of the parties has said to the other in effect, "If you go on and perform your side of the contract I will not perform mine" (in Withers v. Reynolds it was, "You may bring your straw, but I will not pay you upon delivery as under the contract I ought to do. I will always keep one bundle of straw in hand so as to have a check upon you,"), that in effect amounts to saying, "I will not perform the contract." In that case the other party may say, "You have given me distinct notice that you will not perform the contract. I will not wait until you have broken it, but I will treat you as having put an end to the contract, and if necessary I will sue you for damages, but at all events I will not go on with the contract." That was settled in Hochster v. De la Tour [22 L. J. Q. B. 455; 2 El. & Bl. 678; see "CONTRACT," vol. i., col. 670], in the Q. B., and has never been doubted since; because there is a breach of the contract although the time indicated in the contract has not arrived. That is the law as laid down in Withers v. Reynolds. In Freeth v. Burr it was also so laid down.—p. 442.

LORD BRAMWELL.—I cannot tell why Honck v. Muller (post) and Hoare v. Rennie (supra, col. 2991) should be brought forward upon this occasion. I do not think I said in Honck v. Muller what Sir G. Jessel [9 Q. B. D. 658] supposed me to have said, namely, that "in no case where the contract has been part performed could one party rely on the refusal of the other to go on." If I did say so I recall it, because I do not think so; it depends on the nature of the contract and the circumstances of the case. What I was busy upon in that case was in showing that there had been no performance at all there, and that in truth what the plaintiff was seeking to do was to make the defendant accept the performance of something entirely different from what had been agreed upon, and I think in that opinion I was right. But what has that to do with this case? Suppose I was wrong, what then? Suppose Honck v. Muller was wrongly decided, how does it bear upon this case? Not in the least. Nor, indeed, does Hoare v. Rennie, which, in my opinion, was decided upon the considerations which I have mentioned and which I think should be supported.—p. 446.

COLLINS, L.J.—It is clear law that the breach of one of several stipulations does not of itself prove such a declaration of intention [to repudiate all rights and obligations under the contract]. Whatever doubt there may have been arising out of cases like Withers v. Reynolds (supra, col. 2991) and Hoare v. Rennie (supra, col. 2991), where the Court held that a breach was evidence of entire refusal of the contract, according to Franklin v. Miller (supra, col. 2994), Simpson v. Crippin (supra, col. 2993), and Mersey Steel and Iron Co. v. Naylor, where the whole subject was debated, the law is now clearly this, that the breach of one stipulation does not carry with it even an implication of an intention to rescind the whole contract, though in point of law it may do so if the circumstances ground such an inference. But the further the parties have advanced in the performance of the contract, the less possible it becomes to draw the inference that the party failing in performance really intended to renounce the contract.—p. 585.

A. L. SMITH, M.R.—These contracts contain a condition which I do not remember to have seen before—namely, that payment on due date is to be a condition precedent to future deliveries. In Mersey Steel and Iron Co. v. Naylor it was held that non-payment for one delivery under a contract for delivery in instalments, did not of itself justify the vendor in refusing to make any further deliveries according to the terms of the contract.—p. 35. And see "CONTRACT," vol. i. col. 672.

KEATING, J.—A somewhat similar question arose in this Court in the recent case of Alexander v. Vanderzee. There the defendant contracted for a quantity of Danubian maize, "for shipment in June and [or] July, 1869." . . . The learned judge left it to the jury to say whether the cargoes in question were "June shipments" in the ordinary business sense of the term; and they found that they were.—p. 21.

BRETT, J.—But a phrase, though not grammatically accurate, may have an intelligible mercantile meaning; and it seems to me that Alexander v. Vanderzee is an authority to show that the mercantile meaning, as distinguished from the grammatical meaning, is a question for the jury.—p. 22.

CAIRNS, L.C.—The C. A. in the present case appears to have thought that there was some rule of general application laid down by the decision of Alexander v. Vanderzee, in the Ex. Ch., and that that rule was binding, or ought to have been held binding, on the Court below in the present case. My lords, I do not find that there was anything that could be called a rule laid down in Alexander v. Vanderzee. . . . The case, therefore, of Alexander v. Vanderzee, in the first place, laid down no general rule; it proceeded on the finding of the jury in that particular case, and, whether it laid down a rule or not, the rule would not be applicable to a case like the present, in which the facts are different from the facts which occurred there.—pp. 466, 467.

LORD HATHERLEY.—I pass altogether from Alexander v. Vanderzee, because, for the reasons which have been already assigned, it appears to me to be distinguishable from this case, and to have laid down no rule whatsoever which can be usefully applied to the case now to be decided.—p. 472.

BRAMWELL, L.J.—In Gath v. Lees, cotton "was to be delivered at seller's option in August or September, 1864." The seller elected to exercise that option in August, and notice that it would be so exercised was accepted by the buyers. The sellers had a right to exercise that option; but in this case, upon the defendant's hypothesis, the plaintiffs by naming the Charles Platt, exercised their option in an improper manner: therefore they had a right to withdraw their tender, and to exercise it in a proper manner. That case shows that this action is maintainable.—p. 503.

COCKBURN, C.J. (in the Q. B.).—I should be most unwilling to cast a shadow of doubt on the correctness of the decision of this Court in Tanvaco v. Lucas, and if the words in this contract, "50 tons more or less of no moment," &c., were a limitation as to quantity, this case would have been directly in point. But . . . I think that they were not intended as a limitation of the quantity which the plaintiffs were authorised to buy on behalf of the defendant, but simply to prevent them from being fettered in the event of their finding a vessel able to carry more or less than the precise quantity of 500 tons.—p. 54.

members of the Court, upon which the counsel for the plaintiff elected to amend. But what is still more material is, that the facts of the present case are plainly distinguishable from those in Fischel v. Scott. In the latter case the defendant had taken upon himself to sell the goods, trusting to their coming consigned to him. . . . Here, the bales of gambier, on the arrival of which the plaintiff in his second count relies, never were expected by the defendants to come consigned to them, nor did they affect to deal with them.—p. 33.

COTTON, L.J.—But it is urged that the decision in Brandt v. Lawrence has given a judicial interpretation of these words, "per vessel or vessels," in a contract which would otherwise be entire and indivisible. I cannot consider Brandt v. Lawrence as laying down a general rule of construction, but merely as deciding that the words in that case having regard to the words, "Honch or vessels," was divisible. [His lordship proceeded to compare the facts of the two supra, at length.]—p. 250.

LUSH, J., (for the Court).—King v. Parker we cannot regard as a satisfactory decision upon this point. The main point raised and argued was whether the strike itself put an end to the contract. The Court held that it did not, and from that opinion, looking to the terms of the contract, we see no reason to dissent. The question whether it was too late, having regard to all the circumstances, for the seller to insist on delivery, was certainly raised, but does not appear to have been pressed, and the C.B. gives no opinion upon the point.—p. 476.

COLLINS, M.R.—Liquidation of itself clearly does not involve inability to carry out the contract, though it certainly may, coupled with other circumstances, such as those mentioned in Chalmers, Ex parte, Edwards, In re, and Morgan v. Bain, ground an inference that the liquidating company has renounced the contract. Here there does not seem to me to be sufficient evidence to justify any such inference. At the time when these actions were brought and tried the company were in possession of assets undistributed amounting to a very large sum, and could in no sense be described as insolvent, even if inadequacy without more could be treated as equivalent to a repudiation of the contract, as it clearly could not. See Chalmers, Ex parte. Insolvency alone could at most entitle the person called on to deliver to refuse to do so, except on cash terms. See Morgan v. Bain and Stapleton, Ex parte (see post).—p. 957.

JESSEL, M.R.—That [Phoenix Bessemer Steel Co., In re] was an action founded on a contract for selling goods on credit. . . . The only point argued was whether the persons who were entitled to the credit were insolvent in such a way, and to such an extent, that the vendors had a right to say, "we will not sell except for cash." That was the only point argued. Nobody argued that upon the refusal of the vendors to sell without cash, and when the answer is, "we must decline to take the iron," the vendors were released from the contract. I held that they were not when the case came originally before me at the Rolls; the C. A. affirmed that decision. That was the case of a contract that had been performed to a very considerable extent.—p. 658.

LORD BLACKBURN.—The contract was not void, but only voidable at the election of the company. In Clough v. L. & N. W. Ry., in the judgment of the Ex. Ch. it is said, "We agree that the contract continues valid till the party defrauded has determined his election by avoiding it. In such cases (i.e. of fraud) the question is, Has the person on whom the fraud was practised, having notice of the fraud, elected not to avoid the contract? Or, Has he elected to avoid it? or, Has he made no election? We think that so long as he has made no election he retains the right to determine it either way; subject to this, that if, in the interval whilst he is deliberating, an innocent third party has acquired an interest in the property, or if, in consequence of his delay the position even of the wrongdoer is affected, it will preclude him from exercising his right to rescind." It is, I think, clear on principles of general justice, that as a condition to a rescission there must be a restitutio in integrum. The parties must be put in statu quo.—p. 1278.

Thomas*, if that case can be considered good law, is an authority in point. In that case, a gun, which had been manufactured for a purchaser, had, when delivered, a defect in it, which afterwards caused it to burst, yet it was held that, although the manufacturer, instead of making the purchaser acquainted with the defect, had resorted to a contrivance to conceal it, as the buyer had had an opportunity of inspecting the gun, and had accepted it without doing so, and had used it, it was not competent for him to avoid the contract on the ground of fraud. This decision has, however, been questioned, and, altogether dissenting from it, I notice it only to say that my opinion in the present case has been in no degree influenced by its authority.—p. 226.

BRAMWELL, C.J.—I doubt whether a [defrauded] shareholder is liable [to the creditors of the company] on the ground of estoppel. I think his liability depends on a principle similar to that upon which the decision in Kingsford v. Merry proceeded. It was there held that if the owner of goods sells them owing to a fraudulent representation, and if before he discovers the fraud another person acquires some claim to them, he cannot afterwards rescind the contract. And I think it clear upon the authorities that whenever the rights of other persons intervene, a contract to take shares, though induced by fraud, cannot be rescinded.—p. 308.

PARKE, B.—The fraud only gives a right to rescind. In the first instance, the property passes in the subject-matter. An innocent purchaser from the fraudulent possessor may acquire an indisputable title to it, though it is voidable between the original parties. This was decided in the recent case of White v. Garden (see post), and had been so before in Parker v. Patrick, by Mr. Justice Story's decision [1 Sumner, p. 309], by Lord Kenyon in Wright v. Lawes [4 Esp. 82], and in *Load v. COCKBURN, C.J.—Now comes the question whether these goods were left in the order and disposition, and I think Load v. Green quite disposes of that question. I approve of that case. A vendor is not liable for the bad title unless there is an express warranty, or an equivalent to it by declaration or conduct, and the question in each case, where there is no warranty in express terms, will be whether there are such circumstances as to be equivalent to such a warranty.—p. 152.

LORD CHELMSFORD (for self, SIR J. COLVILLE and SIR E. V. WILLIAMS).—There is no case to be found in the books where, after a sale and complete delivery of a chattel, and the price not paid, the vendor's taking the property out of the purchaser's possession has been held to amount to a rescission of the contract. Martindale v. Smith, and other cases, have determined that, where there is an agreement to purchase property, to be paid for at a future time, and the money is not paid at the day, the property remaining in the possession of the vendor, he has no right to sell it, and if he does the purchaser may maintain trover against him. . . . But the authorities are uniform on this point, that if before actual delivery the vendor re-sells the property while the purchaser is in default, the re-sale will not authorise the purchaser to consider the contract rescinded, so as to entitle him to recover back any deposit of the price, or to resist paying any balance of it which may be still due.—p. 145.

BOWEN, L.J.—At common law it has always been considered that misrepresentations which strike at the root of the contract are sufficient to avoid the contract on the ground explained in Kennedy v. Panama, & Co. Royal Mail Co.; but when you come to consider what is the exact relief to which a person is entitled in a case of misrepresentation, it seems to me to be this, and nothing more, that he is entitled to have the contract rescinded, and entitled accordingly to all the incidences and consequences of such rescission.—p. 592.

COLERIDGE, C.J. (for the Court).—Noble v. CROMPTON, J.—Clay v. Yates (supra), turned . . . upon the peculiar circumstances of the case. I have some doubt upon the propriety of the decision.—p. 253.

HILL, J.—I think the decision in Clay v. Yates perfectly correct, according to the particular subject matter of the contract in that case, which was not a case of a chattel ordered by one of another, thereafter to be made by the one, and afterwards to be delivered to the other. . . . In my opinion, Atkinson v. Bell is good law, subject only to the objection to the dictum of Bayley, J., which has been repudiated by Maule and Erle, JJ., in Grafton v. Armitage (supra). . . . The proposition of Bayley, J., that where a person has bestowed work and labour on his own materials he cannot maintain an action for work and labour, is certainly not universally true; and Tindal, C.J., as well as the other members of the Court, in Grafton v. Armitage, repudiated that doctrine and explained that Bayley, J. must be regarded as speaking with reference to the particular circumstances of the case then before the Court; and the same view was taken by the Ct. of Ex. in Clay v. Yates; but the decision in Bell v. Atkinson was regarded as good law by Tindal, C.J., and by other learned judges, viz., that when the subject of the contract is goods to be sold and delivered, a count for work and labour cannot be sustained: that is directly applicable to the present case.—p. 253.

BLACKBURN, J.—In Atkinson v. Bell, had the contract been carried out, it would have resulted in the sale of the machine; and in Grafton v. Armitage, Tindal, C.J. observed of that case, "The substance of the contract was, goods to be sold and delivered by the one party to the other." Taking that as the true criterion, Atkinson v. Bell, Grafton v. Armitage and Clay v. Yates are not inconsistent, but the last case comes very near the line. Here, if the teeth had been delivered and accepted, the contract for the sale of a chattel would have been complete.—p. 254.

PATTESON, J.—There must have been something peculiar in the facts of Iley v. Franken- stein; or it must be misreported. It seems there to be put that the goods were returnable on the demand of the seller if the vendee did not sell them; and it is stated that the proper form of action would have been for not returning the goods pursuant to the contract. According to my experience, goods delivered on sale or return are returnable at the option of the buyer.—

BRAMWELL, L.J.—I cannot say that this case is concluded by Moss v. Sweet. In that case the defendant either might have returned the goods, or was prevented from returning them by his own act, that is, by selling them. In the present case the defendant is unable to return the earrings by the dishonest act of another person; and the Ct. of Q. B. did not decide that if the failure to return, within a reasonable time, goods received "on sale or return" arose from the wrongful act of another person, the person receiving them is to be deemed to have bought them: nevertheless, although this point was not decided, I incline to think that the person receiving goods on those terms, must, under all circumstances, either return them within a reasonable time or pay for them.—p. 282.

HANNEN, J.—It is essential to the creation of a contract that both parties should agree to the same thing in the same sense. Thus, if two persons enter into an apparent contract concerning a particular person or ship, and it turns out that each of them, misled by a similarity of name, has a different person or ship in his mind, no contract would exist between them—Raffles v. Wichelhaus.—p. 228.

COLLINS, M.R.—A question nearer that discussed in this case was raised in Roper v. Johnson. There the action was for the breach of a contract to sell to the plaintiffs, coal to be delivered during the months of May, June, July, and August, 1872. The defendant, soon after the contract was entered into, intimated his determination not to perform it, and it was agreed that the repudiation of the contract was accepted by the plaintiffs, at all events on July 3rd, when they brought the action for non-performance of it. . . . It seems to me that the question discussed in that case arose in consequence of the plaintiffs bringing their action before the period for completion of the contract had expired, the inference to be drawn from that fact being that the plaintiffs had elected to treat the repudiation of the contract as a breach of it. The possible measure of damages suggested by the defendant would not have arisen if the plaintiffs had not elected to treat the repudiation of the contract by the defendant as a final breach, by bringing their action before the period fixed for the completion of the contract, and it does not arise where, as in this case, the plaintiff has not treated the repudiation of the contract by the defendants as a breach, but has insisted on the performance of the contract. This view of the law is also very clearly put by the M.R. (Lord Esher) in Johnstone v. Milling (supra).—p. 269.

COLERIDGE, C.J. (for the Court).—In Stead v. Dawber there was a written agreement for the delivery of goods on a particular day, and a subsequent verbal agreement for their delivery on a later specified day; and the Court came to the conclusion that the parties intended to substitute the latter verbal agreement for the previous written agreement. But in the case now before the Court, there was no fresh agreement at all for the delivery of the twenty-five tons which can be regarded as having been substituted for the original written contract. There was nothing more than a waiver by the defendant of a delivery by the plaintiff in June of the last twenty-five tons of iron; and it should seem that in Stead v. Dawber, the Court would have been in favour of the plaintiff if they had come to the conclusion that there had been no substitution of one agreement for another. Marshall v. Lynn was a somewhat similar case decided on similar grounds.—p. 360.

COLERIDGE, C.J. (for the Court).—The distinction between a substitution of one agreement for another and a voluntary forbearance to deliver at the request of another was pointed out and recognised in Ogle v. Vane (Earl). In that case the plaintiff sued the defendant for not delivering iron pursuant to a written contract, and the plaintiff sought to recover as damages the difference between the contract price of the iron and the market price, not at the time of the defendant's breach, but at a later time, the plaintiff having been induced to wait by the defendant, and having waited for his convenience. It was contended that the plaintiff was in fact suing for the breach of a new verbal agreement for delivery at a later date than that fixed by the original agreement; but the Court held otherwise, and that, as the plaintiff had merely forbore to press the defendant, and had not bound himself by any fresh agreement, the plaintiff could sue on the original agreement, and obtain larger damages than he could have obtained if he had not waited to suit the defendant's convenience. . . . In that case the request for forbearance was made by the vendor after the contract had been broken; in this case the request for time was made by the purchaser both before and after the time for completing the contract had expired; but this distinction does not appear to us to be material—see Tyers v. Rosedale and Ferryhill Iron Co. (post).—p. 361.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think that the true principle [*Hadley v. PARKE, B.—The proper principle is laid down in Leigh v. Paterson, where, as in the present case, the defendant gave notice that he would not fulfil his contract. The contract was, notwithstanding, held, and properly so, to continue open and obligatory on both parties. . . . In Startup v. Cortazzi the defendant had agreed to deliver a quantity of linseed, and part of the purchase-money had been paid in advance. The defendant gave notice that the contract would not be fulfilled; and it was held that the plaintiff was entitled, in the way of damages, to the repayment of his advance, with interest, and also to the difference between the contract price and the price when the linseed ought to have been delivered.—p. 33.

MARTIN, B.—The plaintiffs no doubt lost

what they sued for, but it seems to me they are only entitled to ordinary damages. One test is to suppose the goods [shoes] were burnt, and in such case I cannot see that the plaintiffs could recover four shillings a pair, but think they could recover only the value of the shoes at the time when they were burnt. As respects France v. Gaudet, the champagne case, the action there was between vendor and vendee, and further, there is, I think, little analogy in the cases on this subject, and each case must stand on its own grounds.—p. 61.

BRAMWELL, L.J.—When a person has been induced to buy something by the fraud of the seller, if on discovering the fraud he is still in possession of the chattel, and can restore it in the same state as when he obtained it, he can receive back the full price of the chattel. It may be that in the present case if the trustee of the bankrupt purchaser could have tendered back the rupee paper which the bankrupt had purchased, he could have recovered back the whole purchase-money, according to Brookman v. Rothschild. I do not say that he could, for I hope this case could have been distinguished from that, which, assuming as I do that it was right in law, was a decision that, in my opinion, worked most grievous and unreasonable injustice, in which money was simply taken out of the pocket of one person who was entitled to keep it, and put into that of another who had no right to have it. Perhaps if there could in any way have been a restitutio in integrum in this case, the plaintiff might have recovered the whole of the price. But it is not necessary to discuss that matter, for our decision is not founded on that consideration.—p. 519. And see ante, col. 2515.

LORD BLACKBURN.—There it is said that the delivery of a part is a delivery of the whole. . . I had always understood the law upon that point to have been agreed law, which nobody ever doubted since an elaborate judgment in Dixon v. Yates, by Lord Wensleydale, who was then Parke, J. The rule I had always understood, from that time down to the present, to be that the delivery of a part may be a delivery of the whole if it is so intended, but that it is not such a delivery unless it is so intended, and I rather think that the onus is upon those who say that it was so intended.—p. 586.

SIR B. PEACOCK (for the Court).—The question in this case arises from the circumstance that the appellants filled the double character of vendors and warehousemen. . . The question then comes, was the arrangement that warehouse rent was to be paid equivalent to actual delivery, so as to prevent the vendors from having their right of lien. That point seems to have been determined in Miles v.

Gorton. . . In this case the goods, whilst in the warehouse, though rent was payable for them, remained in the possession of the appellants; and their lordships are of opinion that as the goods remained in the possession of the vendors, and no actual delivery had been made to the purchasers, the vendor's lien revived upon the insolvency of the vendees.—p. 323, 324.

BLACKBURN, J.—Bloxham v. Sanders [1 B. & C. 941] and Milgate v. Kebble are cases of unpaid vendors, and therefore are not authorities directly applicable to a case of pledge. But the position of a partially unpaid vendor who irregularly sells the goods, which have only been partially paid for, is very analogous to that of a pledgee, and in Milgate v. Kebble, Tindall, J., is reported to have used language that seemed to indicate that in his opinion a pledgor could not have maintained trover any more than the vendee in that case.—p. 249.

Ruding* clearly establish that the right of stoppage in transitu is not discharged absolutely by an indorsement of a bill of lading by way of security or pledge, but that it remains, in equity at all events (and that is quite enough for the present purpose), as it was before, subject to a charge in favour of the indorsee of the bill of lading, which must be paid off, and which being paid off, the person entitled to, and exercising, the right of stoppage in transitu stands in exactly the same position as to everybody else as if there had been no security, and no pledge, and no indorsement of the bill of lading.—p. 576.

JAMES, L.J.—With all respect for the decision of the C.J., I am of opinion that this case cannot be distinguished from the authorities which have been referred to, in particular that of Berndtson v. Strang. The authorities show that the vendor has a right to stop in transitu until the goods have actually got home into the hands of the purchaser, or of someone who receives them in the character of his servant or agent. . . . It is admitted that if it had been mentioned in the original contract for sale that the goods were to be carried to Glasgow the present case could not have been distinguished from Berndtson v. Strang, but it is said that the fact that no ultimate destination was mentioned affords a distinction. It seems to me, however, that the mere fact that the port of destination was left uncertain, or was changed after the contract for sale, can make no difference.—p. 568.

BRETT, L.J.—In Berndtson v. Strang the test put by Lord Cairns is, whether the goods have been delivered only to a carrier, although he may have been named by the purchaser. There the ship had been chartered by the purchaser, and therefore, when the goods were placed on board there was a constructive delivery to him. Yet, because the goods were in the hands of the shipowner as carrier, it was held that the transit was not over until that carriage was over.—p. 570.

MATHEW, J.—The further point was made that the notice to stop was insufficient, because it had been served on the owners and not on the master of the ship. But the notice had been given to the owners under such circumstances as enabled them to communicate with the master, and prevent a delivery contrary to the terms of the notice to stop—*Whitehead v. BRETT, L.J.—Coates v. Railton is somewhat difficult of explanation; perhaps it may be explained on the same grounds as some other decisions; but if it cannot, I think the decision wrong.—p. 366.

COTTON, L.J.—This is a fresh transit, not from the seller to the buyer, but by or from the buyer. The principle is laid down by Bayley, J., in Coates v. Railton, where he says: "It is a general rule that where goods are sold to be sent to a particular destination named by the vendee, the right of the vendor to stop them continues until they arrive at that place of destination."—p. 367.

BOWEN, L.J.—In Coates v. Railton several cases were cited by Bayley, J., in the course of his judgment, and the principle to be deduced from them is that, where goods are sold to be sent to a particular destination, the transitus is not at an end until the goods have reached the place named by the vendee to the vendor as their destination.—p. 369.

JAMES, L.J.—Whether that decision was right or wrong, it appears to me that it is binding upon us, and it is not less binding on me because I was a party to it. It is a decision of the C. A., and it is not open to be re-heard merely because the Court now consists in part of the same judges. It appears to me that it is impossible to distinguish between the present case and Golding, Davis & Co., Ex parte.—p. 454.

BAGGALLAY, L.J.—I desire to add that the doubts which, in Golding, Davis & Co., Ex parte, I said that I had entertained during the argument turned entirely upon the special circumstances of that case. My doubt was whether the goods had not been delivered at Liverpool to Knight & Son and then started on a fresh transitus. Upon consideration, I was satisfied that that was not the right view of the facts.—p. 454.

BRAMWELL, L.J.—There is the decision in Golding, Davis & Co., Ex parte, which seems to me to be exactly in point. I am not going to

Miles, Ex parte, Isaacs, In re (1885) 15 Q. B. D. 39; 54 L. J. Q. B. 566.—C.A.

BRETT, M.R.—It seems to me that Watson, Ex parte, was decided upon the assumption that the purchaser, having made his arrangements for the transit, directed the vendor to send the goods, according to those arrangements, straight from the place of manufacture to Shanghai. There was nothing more to be done as to the transit after the vendor had directed the goods to be conveyed to Shanghai to the person to whom they were to be delivered there. It was assumed that the vendor in that case knew, not only that the goods were to go to Shanghai, but that they were to be delivered to a specified firm there. From the moment, therefore, that the goods left the vendor's hands until they arrived at the place of business of that firm in Shanghai they would be in transit, without the necessity of any new order from the purchaser.—p. 46.

LINDLEY, L.J.—In Watson, Ex parte, there was a bargain between the buyer and the seller that the goods should go straight to a specified firm at Shanghai, and that that destination should be stated in the bill of lading. The seller could have obtained an injunction to prevent the goods from going elsewhere.—p. 47.

LORD LINDLEY.—It is, of course, true that by employing Capon and trusting him as they did, the plaintiffs enabled him to transfer the timber to any one; in other words, the plaintiffs in one sense enabled him to cheat both themselves and others. In that sense every one who has a servant enables him to steal whatever is within his reach. But if the word "enable" is used in this wide sense, it is clearly untrue to say, as Ashurst, J. said in Lickbarrow v. Mason [2 Term Rep. 63; 1 H. Bl. 357; 1 Sm. L. C. (10th ed.) 674], "that, wherever one of two innocent persons must suffer by the acts of a third, he who has enabled such third person to occasion the loss must sustain it." Such a doctrine is far too wide, and the cases referred to in the argument and commented on by V. Williams, L.J. [in the C.A.] show that it cannot be relied upon without considerable qualification.—p. 676.

LORD HERSHELL (for self, LORD WATSON, SIR B. PHACOCK and SIR R. COUCH).—The test laid down by Lord Ellenborough in Dixon v. Baldwin appears clearly to cover such a case as this. Alluding to Hunter v. Beal [cited in Ellis v. Hunt, 3 Term Rep. 467] in which it was said that "the goods must come to the corporal touch of the vendees, in order to oust the right of stopping in transitu," Lord Ellenborough says that this was "a figurative expression, rarely, if ever, strictly true. If it be predicated of the vendee's own actual touch, or of the touch of any other person, it comes in each instance to a question whether the party to whose touch it actually comes be an agent so far representing the principal as to make a delivery to him a full, effectual, and final delivery to the principal, as contra-distinguished from a delivery to a person virtually acting as a carrier or means of conveyance to or on the account of the principal in a mere course of transit towards him." . . . The law appears to their lordships to be very clearly and accurately laid down by the M.R. in Bethell v. Clark. He says: "When the goods have not been delivered to the purchaser or to any agent of his to hold for him otherwise than as a carrier, but are still in the hands of the carrier as such and for the purposes of transit, then, although such carrier was the purchaser's agent to accept delivery so as to pass the property, nevertheless the goods are in transitu and may be stopped." The present case appears to fall distinctly within the terms there employed.—p. 396.

COTTON, L.J.—In Rosevear China Clay Co., Ex parte, the goods were put by the vendors on board a vessel chartered by the vendee at Fowey, the port named by him, the ultimate destination not being communicated to the vendors. But the master of the vessel received them only as carriers to a further point. Before the vessel started from the port of loading, the vendee committed an act of bankruptcy; and it was held in this Court that the vendors might lawfully stop the goods. In that case the putting the goods on board the vessel was an indication that the goods were to go on a voyage, which was not only unfinished but was not even begun. In that case the transit was not at an end; but Brett, L.J. and I guarded ourselves against extending the principle which we then acted upon to a case like this.—p. 367.

CHELMSFORD, L.C.—Mitchel v. Ede was . . . not a case of stoppage in transitu.—p. 363.

CAIRNS, L.J.—The question in it [Mitchel v. Ede] was, whether a Jamaica planter, who had promised to consign sugars to his London correspondent, to whom he was indebted, had, by shipping sugars on board a general ship of this correspondent, irrevocably appropriated them so as to pass the property and debar himself from altering their destination. It was necessary, therefore, to ascertain quo animo was the delivery made? And the Court, on a special case, held that the circumstance of the ship being a general ship, or a seeking ship, negatived the inference that the delivery was meant to pass the property. In that case the delivery to the owner of the ship was admitted, and the question was, whether the property passed. Here it is admitted that the property had passed to the purchaser, and the question is, was there a delivery? (p. 365) . . . In Goodhart v. Lowe some goods had been shipped on board a general ship in the London docks, and the plaintiff, an unpaid vendor of the particular goods, applied to Lord Eldon for an injunction to restrain the sailing of the ship, and for a ne exeat regno against the master. The application was to stop the transitus of the ship containing the goods of several persons upon a default of one; and it was to this view of the case that the general observations of Lord Eldon, on a motion ex parte for an injunction, are addressed. The bill in that case, at which I have looked, was not framed as a bill of an unpaid vendor to realise a lien or to take accounts; and it is, moreover, during the period since 1819, the date of that case, that the Courts have more clearly shown a disposition to hold that stoppage in transitu does not rescind the contract, in which case there would be no privity in a Court of equity between the parties, but only gives or restores to the vendor a lien for the price.—p. 366.

TINDAL, C.J.—The broad distinction between the case of *Tucker v. The case is not distinguishable from Allan v. Gripper. . . though it appeared there that the goods were deposited in the warehouse of the carrier, which makes the present case even stronger.—p. 61.

BACON, C.J.—The fact seems to be established that at the time the goods were shot out on the quay the purchaser had absconded, and any notice to him would have produced no result. . . . That makes the case very different from Wentworth v. Outhwaite. In that case not only was there an end of the transitus, but there had been actual possession. Carts had been sent to carry away one half of the flax, and the other half remained because the purchaser had not time enough or carts enough to carry it away. But the transitus was at an end, and he was the owner of the goods, and no other person alive, paid or unpaid, could claim the ownership. In . . . Gibbes, Ex parte, the goods upon their arrival at Liverpool were paid for by bills, not good bills, by reason of subsequent failure, but they were paid for. The goods arrived at Liverpool: the purchaser acquired a right from having accepted the bills, and performed the condition to demand from the shipmaster the delivery of the goods. He exercised that right, and I could not adopt the argument that after that they remained in transitu.—p. 788.

MATHEW, J.—The numerous cases, from Smith v. Goss to Watson, Ex parte [5 Ch. D. 35 (supra, col. 3028)] in which the receipt of the goods by the agent has been held not to be a constructive delivery as the buyer indicates; it seems to me with equal clearness the existence and application of the rule. These authorities show that although the fact that a person has been named by the buyer to the seller to receive the goods is some evidence, it is by no means conclusive evidence that the receipt by that person is the end of the transit.—p. 559.

JAMES, L.J.—I do not know that it is necessary for us to lay down any general principle with regard to Slubey v. Heyward and Hammond v. Anderson [1 B. & P. N. R. 69 (post, col. 3038)] under what circumstances a delivery of part of a cargo is to be considered as a delivery of the whole, so as to put an end to the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu.—p. 72.

BRETT, L.J.—With regard to Slubey v. Heyward and Hammond v. Anderson, it seems to me that in the former case the ground of decision was that the captain of the ship had altered his position from that of a mere carrier, and had undertaken, with the consent of the assignees of the bill of lading, to hold the whole of the cargo for them; and in the latter case the wharfinger, who for a time had held for the persons who had put the goods into his hands, had altered his position, and with the consent of the person to whom the goods were transferred, had agreed to hold them no longer for the person who had put them into his hands, but for the vendee. In both cases there was an attornment by the person who held the goods, and unless something equivalent to an attornment is shown on the part of the carrier, so that he has altered his position from that of carrier, and holds them in another capacity, it seems to me the transitus cannot be at an end.—p. 74.

COTTON, L.J.—The judgment in Slubey v. Heyward does not say on what ground the case was decided, other than the special circumstances of the case. In Hammond v. Anderson, as has been already pointed out, there had been an actual weighing by the purchaser of the entirety of the cargo. How can a man weigh a thing that is not in his possession? That prevents any general proposition in favour of the appellant being drawn from those two cases. Then as to Jones v. Jones (post). It looks at first a little more like one which supports the general proposition which is put forward. But when it is examined it amounts only to this, that the Court came to the conclusion as a matter of fact that there was an intention to take the whole when part only was actually taken; and, that being so, it is only an authority that where a purchaser taking part shows an intention, acquiesced in by the carrier, to receive and take possession of the whole, that is a constructive possession of the whole by the acquiescence of both parties. It does not in any way support the proposition that the mere delivery of a part of the cargo, as in the present case, can be looked upon as a constructive delivery of the whole, or as putting the consignee in constructive possession of the whole, so as to defeat the vendor's right to stop in transitu, or the right of the consignee, if he so desires under the

Slubey v. Heyward, observed on.

BRAMWELL, L.J.—I cannot understand Slubey v. Heyward, because it appears that the sub-purchaser had paid for the goods, and on what ground there could be a stoppage in transitu as against him I am at a loss to see. The note of the case is a very loose one. The Court seems to have held that which, with great submission, appears to be a very doubtful proposition, that the carrier's duty had come to an end? As to Hammond v. Anderson (post), there is not a word in the judgments about delivery of part of the cargo being a constructive delivery of the whole. . . . The effect of the decision is shown by the short judgment of Rooke, J., who said, "The facts of the case are too strong to be got over. The whole of the goods was paid for by one bill; a general order was given for the delivery of the whole, and the purchaser under that order went and took away a part; how could he more effectually change the possession?" It was a delivery of the whole cargo, because the wharfinger was holding the whole for the purchaser as his bailee and with a duty to him.—p. 455.

COTTON, L.J.—Tanner v. Scovell was really only a decision that, where a consignee took part, intending to deal with it in separation from the rest of the cargo, under those circumstances the taking of part was not a taking of the whole.—p. 76.

BIGHAM, J.—Two cases were relied upon by the defendants—Cooper, Ex parte, McLaren, In re, and Barrow, Ex parte, Worsdell, In re. The first laid down in clear terms that the transitus does not end until, by agreement between the carrier and the consignee, the former holds as warehouse-keeper for the latter. The second case, which involved only a question of fact, determined that in the particular circumstances of that case no such an agreement ought to be inferred. I fully accept the law laid down in the first case, and my decision in no way conflicts with it, for I have found the necessary agreement did exist; and as to the second case, I would point out that before any advice note could be served on the consignee he had absconded, and there were no facts which could justify a conclusion that the goods were being held for him otherwise than in transit.—p. 501. These cases are not referred to in the report in Law Reports.

BRETT, L.J.—The distinction taken in *James v. COTTON, L.J.—If the contract had been to deliver the clay to an agent of the purchaser at Fowey, it would have been a very different matter, the case would then have been like that of Valpy v. Gibson, in which the shipment was made by the purchaser, not by the vendor.—p. 572.

BRETT, M.R.—The case seems to me also to be really within Valpy v. Gibson; that is, within that part of the judgment which has always been treated as an authority, and which almost exactly describes the present case. Wilde, C.J., said: "With regard to the right of stoppage in transitu, it appears to us, that, though the defendants knew the goods were to be sent to Valparaiso, and so informed Leech, Harrison & Co. when they forwarded them to Liverpool, yet that Leech, Harrison & Co. could not simply on that information forward the goods to Valparaiso, but that they held them subject to such orders as Brown might give as to forwarding them to Valparaiso or elsewhere; and the transitus was consequently at an end as soon as the goods came to the hands of Leech, Harrison & Co." It is true that this may be said to be only a dictum, because the learned C.J. afterwards gave another ground for his decision. But upon mercantile law a written judgment of Wilde, C.J., whether it is dictum or decision, is as strong an authority as you can well have, and the passage which I have read has always been treated as such.—p. 45.

HATHERLEY, L.C.—This case undoubtedly creates great difficulty. The Court there laid great weight on the finding that the minister was unfit, and said that there was no traverse of the sound discretion; and if the meeting had a sound discretion, and if they found that he was unfit, in addition to the other things that they had found, there was no fault in the decision they had come to, and the decision must be upheld. I cannot say I am altogether satisfied with that reasoning, and I do not know how far that case was determined upon the point which arose upon the pleadings. If a number of reasons are assigned by those who are called upon to vote on a given subject, and those reasons are not merely expressed as arguments in the course of a debate, but are averred as those upon which the decision is founded, although the facts have never been investigated, then it seems clear that the proceedings have been altogether erroneous, and it cannot be said that we have got the true mind and judgment of the body.—p. 493. . . .
Feeling, then, as I do, some doubt as to the soundness of the Darlington School Case, and that the conduct towards the defendant has been oppressive, I do not consider myself
fettered by that case.—p. 496.

COLERIDGE, C.J.—I think Richardson v. Saunders not rightly decided. It was a conviction under sect. 12 of the Act of 1876, and the judges held that physical attendance at the door of the school was sufficient. In my opinion, effective attendance—that is, attending to be instructed at a meeting—is what is intended. For the child to present itself at the door and walk away is not enough. If it were the consequences would be serious. Anyone might send children to the school day after day, and they would come back uneducated. Unwilling parents would entirely set aside the Acts of Parliament.—p. 139.

BAGGALLAY, L.J. (for the Court).—It must be assumed, then, at any rate for the purposes of the present appeal, that the defendant was able to pay the prescribed fees. Such being the position of the defendant, we are of opinion that it was his duty when sending his daughter to the James Street school, to provide her with the means of paying (or, in other words, to pay for her) the prescribed school fees, which, by sect. 17 of the Act of 1870, she was in terms required to pay; and that having neglected, or failed to perform this duty, he did not cause her to attend the school within the intent and meaning of the Education Acts. This view of the duty of a parent able to pay in respect of the school fees payable for his child's attendance at a board school is in accordance with that expressed by all the five judges who decided the case of Saunders v. Richardson in the Queen's Bench. and is, in our opinion, supported by the language used in the Education Acts.—p. 585.

COLERIDGE, C.J.—Certainly, in the present cases, if I thought the matter was fairly doubtful, or that the judgment under review could be maintained upon a fair construction of the Act, I should defer at once to the authority of the learned judges, and should affirm the magistrate's decision; but, with every deference, I am unable, after having heard the arguments, to see that this is anything but a perfectly clear case, and I am encouraged to say so, because I understand my learned brothers who decided Saunders v. Crawford are not now perfectly satisfied with their decision. I am of opinion that the decision of the magistrate in the first case before us was erroneous, and should be reversed. His decision was based upon the authority of Saunders v. Crawford, which he properly felt himself bound to follow; and, in my opinion, the decision in that case is itself erroneous.—p. 227. FIELD HAWKINS, STEPHEN and WILLIAMS, JJ. agreed.

LORD HERSCHELL.—It was argued . . . that there was no ground for such a presumption [namely, that the owner of a several fishery is the owner of the soil] in the case of tidal waters, the soil below which is prima facie in the Crown, and where a several fishery must have been the subject of a separate grant. In support of this distinction Somerset (Duke) v. Fogwell, was cited.
 But I do not think the judgment in that case warrants the proposition for which it was cited.—

BAYLEY, J.—The case of Bagott v. Orr seems to me to conclude nothing on the right in question . . . The claim, in that case, was very different from the present; it was a claim for something serving to the sustenance of man, not a matter of recreation only—a claim to take when left by the water, what every subject had an undoubted right to have taken whilst they remained in the water; and upon that claim there was no regular judgment. But it would by no means follow, because all the king's subjects have a right to pick up fish on the shore, that they have, therefore, a right to pass over the sea-shore for the purpose of bathing.—p. 307.

SMITH, L.J.—In Pearce v. Bunting . . . my brother Cave relied greatly, and my brother Wills also to some extent, upon the fact that as no compensation was given by the statute it was improbable that private rights would be interfered with by the legislature, and this ordinarily is so; but Goolden v. Thames Conservators (not reported) in the H.L. indicates that these dredging powers are given to the conservators for navigation purposes, without compensation being also given to private owners for having their rights thus interfered with. . . . The question, as it seems to me, is not what soil has been vested in the conservators, which my brother Cave field to be the question, but what powers of dredging and raising gravel and other substances, and of granting licences to others to do so, have been granted by the statute to the conservators whereby to preserve, improve, and maintain the navigation of the Thames.—p. 722.

BRETT, M.R.—It seems to me that the proposition laid down in Keighley's Case, and adopted in Rex v. Commissioners of Sewers for Somerset, shows which way we ought to decide the present case. That proposition as laid down by Lord Coke, is as follows:—"If one is bound by prescription to repair a wall contra fluxum maris, and he keeps the wall in good repair, and of such height and as sufficient as it was accustomed, and by the sudden and unusual increase of water, salt or fresh, the walls are broken or the water overflows the walls, that in this case the Commissioners of Sewers ought to tax all such persons who hold any lands, &c., according to the quantity of their lands, &c., for no fault was in this case in him who ought to repair it." It seems to me that the effect of that proposition is that, where there is merely a prescription that lays on the frontagers the obligation to maintain and repair the wall, it applies to damages caused by the ordinary action of the sea, and the frontager who has been guilty of no default, and who has kept the wall in a fit state to resist the ordinary action of the sea, is not bound to bear the expense of repairing damages caused by an extraordinary tide. That proposition was adopted in Rex v. Commissioners of Sewers for Somerset.—p. 531.

FRY, J.—That case [Franciklyn v. Colhoun] is, of course, not precisely in point, for [here] the order nisi is not made against a stranger to the action, but was obtained by a stranger to the action. The next case is that of Johnson v. Chippendall (infra). That case throws very little light on the point; all that was determined was that the order could not be made against a stranger. It seems from that that Franciklyn v. Colhoun must be attributed to consent, or some special circumstance.—p. 730.

COTTON, L.J.—In my opinion, in order to make the writ effectual, they [the sequestrators] must do something more, either, as in Willcock v. Terrell, by obtaining an injunction restraining the defendant from receiving the fund, or, as in Wilson v. Metcalfe, where an action was brought to make it effectual.—p. 47.

BRETT, L.J.—Ward v. Booth in my opinion is against the respondent. In that case the M.R. seems to have thought that something more than the issue of the writ of sequestration ought to have been done to make it a charge on the property of the defendant.—p. 46.

ROLFE, B.—The principle on which these cases rest is this: the immediate landlord is bound to protect his tenant from all paramount claims, and when, therefore, the tenant is compelled, in order to protect himself in the enjoyment of land in respect of which his rent is payable, to make payments which ought as between himself and his landlord to have been made by the latter he is considered as having been authorised by the landlord so to apply his rent.

JESSEL, M.R.—It is said that there is authority to show that if the debt sought to be set off was contracted by fraud a different rule prevails; that, although the separate debt of one of the joint creditors was not contracted by fraud, you can set off that against the debt of the joint creditors which was contracted by fraud. It is difficult to see on principle how you can be in a better position than if you had known the facts; and, if the facts had been known, there could be no such set-off. WILLES, J.—The history of the law given by Lord Wensleydale in that case is unfortunately misreported. I see it is not set right in this copy of the volume of Meeson and Welsby, but I think it is in that of the Court of Common Pleas; but the statement of the principle of the case does clearly appear at the end of the judgment, where Parke, B., expresses himself as follows: "It must, however, be considered that in all these cases of goods sold and delivered with a warranty and work and labour, as well as the case of goods to be supplied according to a contract, the rule which has been found so convenient is established and that it is competent for the defendant in all of those not to set off, by a proceeding in the nature of a cross action, the amount of the damages which he has sustained by a breach of the contract, but simply to defend himself by showing how much less the subject-matter of the action was worth, by reason of the breach of contract; and to the extent that he obtains, or is capable of obtaining, an abatement of price on that account, he must be considered as having received satisfaction for the breach of contract, and is precluded from recovering in another action to that extent, but no more." I cannot add to the words of Lord Wensleydale or improve upon them; they show how proper it is that all these matters should be so decided.—p. 280.

WILLIAMS, J.—Simpson v. Hanley was decided solely on the authority of *Peacock v. COCKBURN, C.J.—No doubt there is a case which directly militates against the course we propose to take, viz., Beard v. McCarthy. BOVILL, C.J.—The action is brought upon a contract of sale between the plaintiffs' principal and the defendant, the latter being aware throughout that the plaintiffs were mere agents, and it has long been settled that under such circumstances agents cannot sue. . . . There are many cases . . . in all of which I entirely concur, whilst I have considerable doubt about the only case which had any tendency the other way; that case is Atkins v. Amber, which is not very satisfactorily reported. If may be there was some special property in the goods in that case or some other reason for the ruling of Chief Justice Eyre, which does not apply here.

WILLES, J.—The law with respect to the right of set-off by a third person dealing with a factor who sells goods in his own name and afterwards becomes bankrupt, is well established by George v. Clagett. Where the factor sells in his own name to a third person who buys without notice that he is dealing with an agent, the latter has ordinarily a right to be put in the same position as if the factor was the real principal in the transaction, and may set up against the concealed principal any defence which he may have against the factor. That rule is founded on principles of common honesty. One who satisfies his contract with the person with whom he has contracted ought not to suffer by reason of its afterwards turning out that there was a concealed principal. He who has a set-off pays. Solvit qui compensat (2 Emerigon, 279). There can be no doubt as to the justice of the principle of George v. Clagett.—p. 613.

A broker always professes to make a contract between two principals, and though in recent times the strictness of the rules has to some extent been relaxed, in 1807 a London broker was bound by his bond . . . to make known to "such person with whom the agreement is made the name of his principal, if required, and not to deal on his own account."—p. 258.

BRETT, J.A.—It is true that Mr. Justice Willes, in Semenza v. Brinsley, states it to be necessary that the agent should have the authority of the principal for selling in his own name; but he was only dealing with a demurrer to a plea; and at the end of the judgment he says it was a great pity that the parties did not go on to try the facts; and if the facts had been tried, I have no doubt that as soon as he found that the agent was entrusted with the goods as a factor, he would have held that that proved authority given to him by the principal to sell in his own name, so far as anybody was concerned to whom some limitation of that authority was not disclosed.—p. 138.

WRIGHT, J.—On the one side it is contended for the brokers that the case is one of mutual credits or dealings within sect. 38 of the [Bankruptcy] Act of 1883. On the other side the trustee contends . . . that, according to the doctrine established in ordinary administrations, Rees v. Watts, Newell v. National Provincial Bank, and Gregson, In re—a debt which did not become payable by the deceased in his lifetime, cannot be set off against a debt which became payable to him during his life. . . . I cannot find that the doctrine, or the authorities on which it rests have been recognised as applicable in bankruptcy where, as here, the claim on either side is a claim resulting from contractual dealings between the bankrupt and his creditor, and it seems to me that if the credits or dealings in question were mutual in their origin, it makes no difference in bankruptcy that there has, in respect of one of them, been a transmission of right in consequence of Cronmire's [the bankrupt's] death.—p. 363.

STIRLING, J.—There (Hallett v. Hallett) a policy of assurance on the life of Mr. Hallett was taken in the names of trustees, and a settlement was executed, by virtue of which the bonuses payable under the policy were to be held in trust for Mr. Hallett, and the money assured under the trusts of the settlement. The settlement in point of fact, contained a declaration that nothing therein contained should be construed to vest in the trustees any bonus or additions which might from time to time be declared on the policy of insurance, but the same and every part thereof should be from time to time paid to Hallett, his executors, administrators, and assigns, for his and their own use and benefit, and might be applied as he or they might direct. . . . That decision, therefore, was grounded on the view that the bonuses were not comprised in the settlement at all. That is entirely distinguishable from the present case, because, according to the view adopted by the learned judge, the property there in question was on terms excluded from the operation of the settlement. Here the deed contains an express trust in favour of Edward Weston.—p. 561.

JESSEL, M.R.—The petitioner relied on a decision of the Court of Common Pleas (Cochrane v. Green), in which it was supposed, certainly by Williams, J., and probably by Erle, C.J., that the established rule of equity with reference to set-off is to look upon the beneficial owner as the real owner, and by injunction compel other Courts to recognise his rights, and to disregard the legal title of the trustee. They appear to have grounded their decision on Clark v. Cort, which the Lord Chief Justice says seems to be distinct authority that a Court of equity will allow the defendant, where the debt is due to a trustee for him by the plaintiff, to have all the benefit of a legal owner: in other words, the Court of equity will allow a set-off. If I may say so, with great respect to those learned judges, that is all right with one addition, which is, that it must have been a case where there was equitable jurisdiction. The mere fact of a cross-demand existing would not itself give equitable jurisdiction, nor the mere fact that one of the demands was held by a trustee, that is to say, that one of the demands, though still a legal demand, was, as regards beneficial ownership, the property of the person who was liable to the other demand. I never heard of a bill to enforce such a set-off, although there was a time when every possible device was resorted to in order to obtain an injunction to restrain an action at law. In Clark v. Cort, and in the next succeeding case of Rawson v. Samuel (Cr. & Ph. 154), Lord Cottenham does state the case exactly as I have mentioned it. He says (at p. 159): "The case, then, is not that of a mere assignee of a legal debt coming into equity to have the benefit of a set-off which he could not have at law. It is, therefore not necessary to decide what the Court would do in such a case, though the decision in Williams v. Davies (2 Sim. 461) goes much further than such a case would require." Then he goes on (at p. 160): "As equity recognises the assignee of a debt as the creditor, and as these demands, if both were recoverable at law, would be the subject of a set-off, so if equity has jurisdiction of the subject-matter it will enforce the set-off;" not that it will enforce the set-off without any special jurisdiction. He would have said, "so equity will enforce the set-off," if that were the doctrine; but he says, "so if equity has jurisdiction of the subject-matter," which is the condition precedent. It seems to me that that was not noticed by the learned judges in the Court of Common Pleas. When you come to Rawson v. Samuel, I think he puts that very plainly. He says (at p. 178): "We speak familiarly of equitable set-off as distinguished from the set-off at law, but it will be found that this equitable set-off exists in cases where the party seeking the benefit of it can show some equitable ground for being protected against his adversaries' demand." Then he goes on (at p. 179): "Several cases were cited in support of the injunction, but in every one of them except Williams v. Davies"—which he disapproved of—"it will be found that the equity of the bill impeached the title to the legal demand." Therefore I am not able to assent to the doctrine laid down by the Court of Common Pleas; and if it had been necessary—which it is not—in this case to decide upon that ground, I should have thought I was following the decision of Lord Cottenham in deciding exactly the other way.—p. 35.

BOVILL, C.J.—In all the cases there was some qualification in the first contract, or some connection between the two transactions. The strangest case cited was Smith v. Parkes, but that decision went on the footing that both debts arose out of the same partnership transactions. That being the true principle, the case does not apply. Here there is an absolute debt by bond; no limitation by the subsequent instrument or otherwise; no lien, no charge, nothing to affect it; the transactions are quite unconnected. . . .—p. 288.

STIRLING, J.—I think that if the company were being sued by the bank, it would be entitled to be placed in the same position as it occupied relatively to Taunton on November 6, 1890, on which day Taunton was indebted to the company for calls payable on November 20, while the company was indebted to Taunton on the debentures which did not become payable until a later date. If, then, no winding-up had intervened, and Taunton, or the bank in Taunton's name, had sued on the debentures, the question would be whether the company could set off the debt which accrued due on November 3 (the date of the call), but did not actually become payable until November 20. Neither Watson v. Mid Wales Ry. nor Wilson v. Gabriel (supra) covers this point so far as actual decision goes; for, in the former, no debt had accrued due to the defendants at the date of the notice, and in the latter the debt at the date of the notice appears to have been both due and payable. I think, however, on the principles laid down by Blackburn, J. in Wilson v. Gabriel, the set-off ought to be admitted.

Duncan v. Grant (1834) 4 Tyr. 818.—EX.

BOLLAND, B.—In determining the weight of the conflicting authorities, I am inclined to accede to Lord Tenterden's opinion (Webber v. Penn. Ry. & M. 413), as being more consistent with the words of the statute (2 Geo. 2, c. 22, s. 13), and not likely to have been expressed by him in the manner it was, had he not formed a deliberate opinion on the subject contrary to that of Lord Ellenborough in Coulson v. Jones.—p. 818.

PORTER, M.R.—As to the contention that part of the estate being settled land, the whole is, it rests on nothing more than a dictum of Malins, V.-C., in Shepherd's Settled Estate, not necessary for the decision of the case; a dictum, too, in reference to another Act of Parliament (19 & 20 Vict. c. 120) where the language is essentially different ("including any such instruments affecting the estates of any one or more of such persons exclusively," sect. 1), and in a case where the estate was disposed of in undivided moieties, and not merely cumbered with annuities.—p. 368.

STIRLING, J.—The question which I have to decide is whether it is necessary that such trustees [i.e., for the purpose of the Settled Land Acts] should be appointed, and in this respect it appears to me that the case differs from those which were cited by the advisers of the purchaser in their requisition—namely, Tibbit's Settled Estates, In re, and Meade's Settled Estates, In re, where the question was, as I conceive, simply this—whether a reasonable case had been made for the exercise of the jurisdiction which is conferred on the Court by sect. 38 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, by the appointment of trustees for the purposes of the Act.—p. 398.

CHITTY, L.J. (for self and LINDLEY, M.R., v. WILLIAMS, L.J. doubting).—The judgment in that case [Ailesbury (Marquis) and Iveagh (Lord), In re] has been criticised by some learned writers, particularly in regard to the jointure of Maria, the dowager marchioness. But I think the judgment was right and founded on the true view of the statute. It was held that the settlement was made up of the series of deeds beginning with the deed of 1796 and ending with the deed of 1885, and that, treating these deeds as the settlement, the vendor, who was tenant for life in possession under the deed of 1885 only, had power to bind the jointure of the dowager marchioness which arose under the earlier deeds of the series—namely, those of 1796, 1826, and 1833—and also to bind the jointure of Lady Evelyn Riddell, which arose under the intermediate deed of 1863. It was, no doubt, a circumstance in that case that by the deed of 1885 the life estate of the marquis Ernest under the deed of 1863 was restored to him; and this circumstance in connection with sub-sect. 4 of sect. 2 [Settled Land Act, 1882] relating to the time of the settlement taking effect, was relied upon by the learned judge. But this circumstance would not have carried the compound settlement further back than the deed of 1863. He held, however, that the Savernake estate stood limited to uses in favour of various persons by way of succession under or by virtue of the series of deeds, and that the marchioness Maria was one of the persons taking under the series of deeds, although she did not take by way of succession to the vendor. . . . I see no inconsistency in holding that there may be at the same time a more comprehensive settlement consisting of several deeds, and a less comprehensive settlement constituted by one of the deeds only. The language of sect. 2, sub-sect. 1: "Any instrument or any number of instruments," whereby the land "stands for the time being limited," justifies this conclusion. Had I been of a different opinion on this point I might have found some difficulty on the main questions involved in our present decision. The point, however, was decided by Stirling, J., in Du Cane and Nettlefold's Contract, In re. In his judgment in that case he said, "It is quite plain that one instrument may constitute a settlement, although it is to be admitted that several instruments may, under the same definition . . . also constitute a settlement." I agree with his reasoning and with his decision on this point.—p. 142.

STIRLING, L.J.—The question is whether this property is, within the meaning of sect. 2, sub-sect. 1 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, property which "stands for the time being limited to or in trust for any persons" by way of succession." Now these words have been the subject of decision in the C. A. in Mundy and Roper's Contract, In re. There the C. A. came to the conclusion that jointures and portions limited to arise on the death of a tenant for life came within the meaning of those words.—p. 164.

PORTER, M.R.—This is not a derivative settlement, as in Knowles' Settled Estates, where the fee in remainder after a life estate, having been regularly appointed so as to vest in the object of the power was afterwards (next day) put in settlement upon an entirely new set of trusts. The latter constituted the "derivative settlement," and could not take effect until every trust in reference to the land contained in the original settlement was executed. The first settlement was complete and performed. The second was for conveyancing purposes an independent settlement, just as if the fee had been derived from some other source, though, of course, the original settlement was a vital part of the title.—p. 123.

NORTH, J.—I have never heard of a case where the Settled Land Act has been held applicable to property of this nature, although it is no doubt true, as was said in the judgment of the C. A. in Mundy and Roper's Contract, In re (supra), that the Act ought to be construed in a spirit of wise and reasonable liberality. There is also Castle Bytham (Vicar), Ex parte, which I do not refer to for the purpose of disproving that a limitation to a bishop and his successors constitutes a settlement within the Settled Land Act—that is not contended for—but for the observation made by Stirling, J., that it was difficult to imagine that the Legislature, in passing the Settled Land Act, intended to repeal the Act of Elizabeth [13 Eliz. c. 20] so as to enable the alienation of ecclesiastical land, or to dispense in such cases with the consent of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. It follows that if the Court were to accede to the present application

[to appoint trustees for the purposes of the Act] it would be introducing a precedent which would affect a wide area, and which would lead to the doing of what Stirling, J., said would be a strange result of the Settled Land Act.—p. 525.

BUCKLEY, J.—On a previous application in reference to this same estate [Trenchard, In re, Ward v. Trenchard] Byrne, J. . . . has declared that the widow has the powers of a tenant for life under the Settled Land Act, and that she will not forfeit the benefits given her by the will by selling under such powers. In other words, she can sell; and if she sells she will be entitled as against the proceeds of sale to the same annual benefit (which must then be represented by money) as if she had not sold. This follows the decisions of Pearson, J., in Paget's Settled Estates, In re (post, col. 3078), and of North, J., in Ames, In re (col. 3078), and of North, J., again, in Smith, In re (col. 3078). The result of sect. 51 [Settled Land Act, 1882] is that the provision so far as it is a fetter upon the power of sale is void, and under sub-sect. 2 of that section a new estate is given to the beneficiary by virtue of the statute extending to a like interest in the proceeds of sale. But this having been insured, the words, "as far as," in sect. 51 are satisfied, and if there be a voluntary cesser of residence apart from sale, there is no reason why the testator's disposition should not have effect, inasmuch as that proviso does not tend to induce the tenant for life not to sell. This was the decision of North, J., in Haynes, In re (post col. 3078). It was argued that the decision of Romer, J., in Eastman's Settled Estates, In re, is inconsistent with this view. In my opinion that is not so. The summons did not go to the question of what the rights of the widow would be if she voluntarily ceased to reside apart from sale. The question whether the provision for the reduction of the annuity was void under sect. 51 was raised in connection with the question whether the applicant was entitled during widowhood to the income arising from the power of sale. That question, as it seems to me, was the only question which the learned judge answered. He did not decide that if she voluntarily ceased to reside the reduction of the annuity would not take effect.—p. 181.

NORTH, J.—Under that [sect. 51 of the Settled Land Act, 1882] it seems to me clear that from the time at which a sale or disposition takes place the attempted fetter on the power of a tenant for life is removed, and that is what I consider Pearson, J. decided in Paget's Settled Estates, In re. He says: "It is impossible to say that this clause, which defeats the estate of the son, in case he fails to comply with the condition as to residence, does not tend to induce him to abstain from exercising the power of sale which is conferred on him by the Act. The condition is therefore made void by sect. 51, and, if the son exercises the power of sale, his interest in the proceeds of sale will, by virtue of sub-sect. 2, continue.—p. 309.

It is quite possible to read the Weekly Notes [from which the case was cited] as meaning that; at the same time it is possible to read it otherwise. There is a discretion in the Court, and he exercised his discretion, in not doing what was asked. He declined to give the authority asked for to two ladies; I cannot read that as meaning he would not have listened to the application of ladies.—p. 317.

And the case of Burdin's Will (post) is no longer applicable, because the Amendment Act of 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 45) makes the question whether an estate is "settled" or not depend on the state of circumstances at the time of the settlement taking effect, that is, in the present case, at the time of the testator's death.—p. 175.

BYRNE, J.—In Cockerell v. Cholmeley there was a power given to trustees to sell an estate with the consent of the tenant for life. The power was to sell any part either together or in parcels, and it was held that the trustees could not sell the estate exclusive of the timber growing upon it, leaving to the tenant for life power to sell the wood and underwood at separate prices. It was held that the power was not well executed, but that has no relation to the present case. I may mention that to decide otherwise would lead to a most extraordinary result, and one that never could have been thought of by the framer of this Settlement.—p. 605.

COTTON, L.J.—Jones, In re (supra), was a case where the income of the tenant for life was, in fact, entirely exhausted by the previous charges under the settlement. There it was held that you must not look to see what the actual amount of the income is, but you must look at the settlement; and, in that case, the settlement, although it imposed charges on the estate previous to the tenancy for life, did give an immediate estate for life to Col. Grey, whose interest was then in possession, and who was entitled, subject to the trusts of the term to secure the charges, to the income should there be any. Clitheroe Estate, In re, was really the same thing, and the principle of Sir J. Hannen's judgment is to be found at p. 140 [L. R.]. In my opinion it cannot be said here that this is an estate or interest in possession, subject only to certain trusts for accumulation. It is an estate or interest not in possession, but in futuro, in remainder, only to arise and to exist in possession when the term of twenty years has expired.—p. 432. SIR J. That distinguishes this case from Strangways, In re, and other cases where the estate for life was only to be created under an executory trust at the end of the term; and it was held that the person entitled, not having any estate or interest in possession until the determination of the term, had not, during its continuance, the powers of a tenant for life. The term there had to run out entirely before the interest of the tenant for life could arise at all.—p. 735.

LINDLEY, L.J.—But then it is said that under sects. 38, 45 and 53 [Settled Land Act, 1882], Hoskins was guilty of a breach of trust in not obtaining the appointment of new trustees, and in not giving notice to them, and that this breach of trust affects the plaintiff's title. Now, I think that Hoskins ought to have followed the directions contained in those sections, and might, perhaps, have been restrained by the remainderman from granting a lease until he had done so, as in Wheelwright v. Walker. That, however, was a case of a sale, and the purchaser did not propose to pay the money into court. I also think that the omission to take these steps might prevent the tenant for life from obtaining specific performance against an unwilling lessee. But, assuming all this, the omission to take these steps does not, in my opinion, invalidate the title of a lessee who has acted in good faith. Sect. 45, sub-sect. 3, in my opinion, clearly protects him and his title.—p. 395. BOWEN, L.J. concurred.

KAY, L.J.—I cannot find that the Act makes the existence of such trustees a condition of the power of the tenant for life to grant the lease. There is an express provision that the lessee need not inquire whether notice has been given to them. If he knew there were no trustees, or that notice had not been given, probably he would be justified in refusing to complete, and the Court would not compel him to do so, and would even restrain the tenant for life from making a sale or lease under such circumstances: Wheelwright v. Walker.—p. 399.

LINDLEY, L.J.—It was decided in Cardigan v. Curzon-Howe that a tenant for life could sell, notwithstanding a decree for the execution of the trusts of the settlement; and this goes far to show that a suspended order for sale ought not to deprive the tenant for life of the power to mortgage conferred upon him by the statute [Settled Land Act, 1890, s. 11].—p. 648. STIRLING, J.—Then another case in which, as far as I know, the Court has gone the furthest in controlling the discretion of the tenant for life is that of Hampden v. Buckinghamshire (Earl). There there had been an order made for the sale of settled land which was heavily incumbered, but its operation was postponed for a time to give an opportunity of paying off the incumbrances. . . . Therefore the law as there laid down is that the tenant for life, acting bonâ fide, ought not to be interfered with unless the Court can see that, in spite of his honesty, he is acting unjustly towards those whose interests he is bound to protect.—p. 811.

LINDLEY, L.J.—Even if the plaintiff had known that there were no trustees, it would not follow that his title would be bad. Of course, if the plaintiff had, by conniving at a breach of trust, done the remainderman an injury, he would personally be liable to him for it; but even then a purchaser from him would, I think, be safe. The observations of this Court on sect. 53 in Ailesbury's (Marquis) Settled Estates, In re, go far to show that the title would be good even if there were no trustees, and the purchaser or lessee knew, in fact, that such was the case.—p. 395.

LINDLEY, M.R.—I think that Chitty, J. was quite right when he said in Hope's Settlement, In re, that when a tenant for life applies under sect. 37 of the Act of 1882 for leave to sell heirlooms, there must be some reason to induce the Court to give its sanction, and the fact of the tenant for life having got himself into difficulties was not a circumstance which ought to have weight in deciding in favour of a sale. The observations that I made in Ailesbury's (Marquis) Settled Estates, In re, to which counsel have referred, as to the tenant for life being master of the situation, are, in my opinion, quite right. I was then addressing myself to a case under sect. 3 of the Act of 1882, and the tenant for life there was master of the situation in the sense that he could have ruined the estate by selling the whole of it, except the mansion house. But that is not this case. I was not addressing myself in the least to the question on whom the burden of proof is. I think that Chitty, J. was right when he said in Hope's Settlement, In re, that a person who comes to the Court under the Settled Land Acts must make out a case for a sale. I am not prepared to go the length of saying that the Court should sanction a sale merely because the tenant for life wants it, and in the present case I cannot see any reason for the sale of this diamond, except that this extravagant young tenant for life wishes it sold.—p. 628. ROMER, L.J. concurred.

STIRLING, J.—It has been established by the decision of the House of Lords in this very case, —see Bruce v. Ailesbury (Marquis)—that the Settled Land Act of 1882 is founded on a broader policy and has a wider scope than the Settled Estates Acts. In the former Act it is said the well-being of settled land is the paramount object, in the latter the interests only of the persons interested under the settlement.—p. 717.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—This appeal raises questions of great importance as to the power of a tenant for life under the Settled Land Act to grant a mining lease. In considering the case, I think I am entitled, and indeed bound, to have regard to the policy of the Act as explained by the House of Lords in Bruce v. Ailesbury (Marquis), and not to narrow or cut down the language used in the Act so as to make it conform to decisions given prior to the Act upon powers of leasing conferred by other instruments.—p. 559.

ROMER, J.—Sect. 22 [Settled Land Act, 1882] presupposes the existence of trustees. This was pointed out by Kay, J., as he then was, in *Hatten
v. Russell* (57 L. J. Ch. 425; 38 Ch. D. 334, see post, col. 3096), where he said that "that option cannot properly be exercised, and cannot really be exercised at all, if there are no trustees." The same point arose in Mogridge v. Clapp, and there Kay, L.J., said that "by sect. 22 capital moneys arising under the Act must be paid to the trustees, or into Court, at the option of the tenant for life. But he can only have such option, prima facie, when there are trustees, so that the purchaser could hardly pay his purchase money without ascertaining that there were trustees to whom it might be paid." I agree that in this case if the purchaser were to pay the money into Court in ignorance of the fact that there are no trustees, he would get a good title. But he has notice that there are no trustees, and refuses to complete on that ground.
Such a title ought not, in my opinion, to be forced upon him. As regards the observation of Lindley, L.J., in Mogridge v. Clapp, that "even if the plaintiff had known that there were no trustees, it would not follow that his title would be bad," it must be borne in mind that he was there dealing with the case of a sale.—p. 613.

V. WILLIAMS, L.J.—The title is doubtful because there are really material facts which are themselves in doubt—not merely facts which, theoretically speaking, might be put in issue, as was the case in Mogridge v. Clapp, and as was pointed out by Lindley, M.R., there.—p. 266.

KEKEWICH, J.—At first I was very much puzzled by it [Nugent v. Cuthbert], because there the master words were: "so that none of the said leases were made dispensable of waste by any express words." I do not think that "any express words add" anything to the power there, and I think that the exception as to repair was "casualties of fire and war excepted." On looking through the arguments again, I find that there is an exception as regards fire, and although strangely enough I see nothing about war, I think it may be explained by a sentence in the respondent's argument, at p. 479, where it is said: "Besides, the exception was of that which did not amount to waste, for the word 'casualty' must be construed casualty without default of the tenant." I think the H. L. must have come to the conclusion that what was excepted was not waste. I do not think that that governs this case; but if it did, it would not cover the words "damage by tempest." I should still hold that the exception of fair wear and tear was obnoxious to the statute giving the power, and therefore that the lease is bad on that ground.—p. 505.

PEARSON, J.—But then there is sect. 56 [Settled Land Act, 1882], which I admit is to my mind a section very difficult to construe, but upon which I nevertheless was called upon to put a construction in a former case which came before me—a case from which there has been no appeal, and which therefore I am at liberty to consider for the present purpose as not being contested; and in construing that section in Newcastle's (Duke) Estates, In re, I came to the conclusion that the meaning of the latter part of sub-sect. 2 was this, that in all cases now where under a settlement the trustees have an absolute power of sale, they cannot exercise that power of sale without the consent of the tenant for life.—p. 237.

LINDLEY, M.R.—The Settled Land Act was passed to get rid of the old authorities, which curtailed the powers of a tenant for life, and to enable him to do what he could not do before; and I do not think any cases decided before the Act have any bearing as regards the present case. . . . It is plain, to my mind, that that decision [Dayrell v. Hoare] was right either under the old law or the new law. It decides that a power to let land does not give a power in a lease of part to impose a burden on the rest of it. That was the decision of that case, and the language of Littledale, J. does not apply to a case of this kind at all. I think that case was misunderstood by the learned judge who decided Nevill and Newell's Contract, In re. As to Buckley v. Howell, that was a decision which applied to a sale and not to a lease, and, moreover, it was one which the Legislature thought ought to be got rid of, and an Act of Parliament—the Confirmation of Sales Act, 1862 [25 & 26 Vict. c. 108]—was passed for the purpose.—p. 457. BYRNE, J.—With reference to the cases of Dayrell v. Hoare and Buckley v. Howell, those have been dealt with by the late M. R. (Sir N. Lindley) in Gladstone, In re, and I need add nothing more in reference to them. . . . When a tenant for life comes into possession, and he finds mining leases existing over a portion of the estate, is it to be said that he is not to be entitled to grant building leases if persons are willing to take building leases of the land under which those mines are? The case in my opinion is quite clear, and if any authority were wanted on the point, Gladstone, n re, affords such an authority.—p. 695.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—Dayrell v. Hoare is no authority as to the true construction of sect. 18 of the [Conveyancing] Act of 1881, and the learned judges who decided that case and Sir N. Lindley in Gladstone, In re, were not dealing with what was the meaning of an express power to grant occupation leases of both corporeal and incorporeal hereditaments, which I have to deal with in this case.—p. 873.

BIGHAM, J.—It must be remembered that "land" is defined in the [Conveyancing] Act—see sect. 2, sub-sect. ii.—to include "tenements and hereditaments corporeal and incorporeal," and that it is any part of land so described that the mortgagor has power to lease. On this part of the case I was referred to the judgment of Romer, J., in Sutherland (Dowager Duchess) v. Sutherland (Duke). The case does not, however, appear to me to be of any importance in this connection. It was decided with reference to the supposed exercise of powers under the Settled Land Acts, 1882 and 1890, the provisions of which are quite different from those in the Act which I am now considering.—p. 144.

JESSEL, M.R.—Hurle's Settled Estates, In re, and Chambers, In re, are clear and distinct authorities that the Court will not authorise a sale of a portion of the estate for raising moneys to make roads on building land, or authorise sale moneys to be so laid out. It is true that the learned judges who decided those cases did not consider the argument which has been addressed to me to-day; but that argument, if it is worth anything, must go to this extent, that the Court has the power which it was expressly decided in those cases not to have. Then it appears . . . that in an unreported case of Gilbert, In re (supra), Stuart, V.-C., directed money which happened to be in Court, subject to be laid out to the same uses as the building land, to be applied in making roads; but after the decisions in Drake v. Trefusis (L. R. 10 Ch. 364; see post, col. 3108). and Newman's Settled Estates, In re (43 L. J. Ch. 702; L. R. 9 Ch. 381; see post, col. 3107), I think the circumstance of there being money in Court cannot influence the decision.—p. 525.

Saunders*, a case which, speaking with great respect, I do not understand, it was held that the power to give receipts put a trustee in the same position as if he were a beneficial owner. But the insertion of that power shows that he is only a trustee, and being so he has not a beneficial interest in the property. In Pott's Estate, In re (supra), the tenant for life was still living. . . . After these cases [Eyre v. Saunders and Grey v. Jenkins, supra, col. 3092] had been cited, the late M.R. is reported to have expressed the opinion that the concurrence of the parties beneficially interested was not necessary; but I am informed . . . that Lord Romilly subsequently declined to follow his own decision. The case of Strutt's Trusts, In re, was a very different one. There the gift was to a contingent class, which, as the V.-C. observed, could not be ascertained, and therefore falling within Beioley v. Carter (supra). But then the V.-C. proceeded to cite Pott's Estate, In re, and to give other reasons for his judgment, with which I cannot agree.—p. 692.

BYRNE, J.—The result of Stamford (Earl), In re, is that the Court has undoubted jurisdiction, if it thinks it a proper case, to appoint the solicitor of the tenant for life [as a trustee]; but it is not the course of the Court to make an appointment of this kind, although Stirling, J. did it in one case [Ailesbury (Marquis) and Iveagh (Lord), In re, supra], and no doubt it would be done again in other cases if strong reasons were shown that that would be more beneficial than another appointment. I have considered the question, and I do not see sufficient advantages to be derived from the appointment in this case to induce me to depart from the ordinary rule, which Stirling, J. refers to as follows: "The rule is laid down by the C.A. in Kemp's Settled Estates, In re, a case which arose upon an application for the appointment of trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Act, 1882, under sect. 38 of that Act. Cotton, L.J. said this: 'The gentleman is no doubt a fit person to be a trustee, and the only objection to him is that he acts as solicitor for the tenant for life. Now the appointment of trustees is required to impose a check upon the extensive powers conferred by the Act upon the tenant for life, and sect. 44 contemplates the probability of there being differences between the trustees and the tenant for life. I have no doubt that Mr. Wood, as solicitor of the tenant for life, would advise him to the best of his ability, and recommend him to exercise his powers with a proper regard to the interests of the remaindermen. But solicitors, like judges, are fallible, and how could Mr. Wood, as one of the trustees, exercise a proper judgment on their behalf upon questions on which he had advised the tenant for life? It would be Mr. Wood as trustee putting a check upon Mr. Wood as solicitor to the tenant for life, and he would be placed in a false position.' Now that case lays down a rule of practice for the guidance of the Court, and it would not be right for me to depart from it."—p. 81.

JOYCE, J.—That clause [Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 22, sub-s. 2] has been considered in various cases, and it was held in Coleridge's (Lord) Settlement, In re, that the tenant for life was entitled to choose the investments and the security on which the investments were to be made. But it was also decided in Hotham, In re, which I must take to be law at present, that in the case of a mortgage security, "when the trustees and the tenant for life act by different solicitors, it will rest with the solicitors for the trustees to do what is necessary with reference to the mortgage." That case being, as I understand, under appeal, I do not know what may happen with respect to it in the future, but at present I shall follow it. . . . In my opinion, the trustees may select their own solicitors and their own brokers. I agree with what Cozens-Hardy, J. decided in Hotham, In re.—pp. 765, 766.

CHITTY, J.—In that case [Beck, In re] it does appear that the V.-C. allowed the costs of the mortgagees of the tenant for life; but there is no decision on that point, and it is just one of those matters which might pass without any great consideration; and, as far as I can see, it was a case rather of a friendly nature. Although the point was mentioned to the V.-C., I cannot find any judgment of his which shows that his mind was drawn to the various parts of the Act bearing upon it. I think I am entitled, therefore, to say that that is not an authority for the point which has been fully argued before me.—pp. 343-4.

CHITTY, J.—A point strongly pressed against this application was the allegation that the earl has been driven to have recourse to a sale of the heirlooms by his own incumbrances. Now, as a general rule, I think that the circumstance that the tenant for life has incumbered his life estate under the settlement ought to be excluded from consideration by the Court on a question of granting or refusing an order sanctioning a sale of heirlooms. I so held in Marlborough's (Duke) Settlement, In re, and Beaumont's Settled Estates, In re (supra). But any such general rule has no application to the present case. The incumbrances created by the earl are on his life estate under an entirely different settlement. I cannot see how the fact that the tenant for life, apart from the settlement in question, is richer or poorer, is material.—p. 410.

ESHER, M.R.—North, J., thought he was precluded, not indeed by the express terms, but by the logical result of the decision of Kay, J., in Sudeley's (Lord) Settled Estate, In re, from sanctioning the payment of part of the sum demanded for redemption—that part which has been called a “bonus.” . . . That case was not one of the redemption of a rent charge. It was asked that the trustees might pay out of capital moneys the instalments of the rent-charge as they should become due, including, that is, interest as well as principal. Kay, J., was of opinion that the interest was a debt due from the tenant for life, and that he could not authorise the trustees to pay it out of “capital moneys.” Even if he was right in that view, it does not, I think, affect the present case. But I will venture to say that I think he took too strict a view of the Settled Land Act, 1887. It is quite true that what he was asked to do did not come within the words “redeeming such rent-charge,” but I think it did come exactly within the words “or otherwise providing for the payment thereof.” I could not therefore agree with the decision in Sudeley's (Lord) Settled Estates, In re, even if it governed the present case. But I think it does not, for this is a case of redemption pure and simple.—p. 399.

STIRLING, J.—There is no question that the Court has in certain cases exercised control over the tenant for life. One case much relied on on behalf of the remainderman is Knatchbull's Settled Estate, In re. There the tenant for life had, prior to the Settled Land Act, created charges for land drainage and improvements under the Improvement of Land Act, 1864, and these were repayable by instalments. In that case it was held that he was not entitled “under the Settled Land Act, sect. 21, sub-sect. 2, to have these charges paid out of the capital of the settled estates so as to relieve him from the payments of the instalments.” Part of the ground for that decision was that payment of the incumbrances in question did not fall within the terms of the section which is referred to.—p. 811.

KEKEWICH, J.—I apprehend that under sect. 1 [Settled Land Act, 1887] the only alternative you have is that capital money may be expended in redeeming a rent charge "or otherwise providing for the payment thereof," and "shall be deemed to be applied in payment for an improvement authorised by the Act of 1882." That does not seem to me to point towards recouping a tenant for life payments which he has made out of his own moneys for reduction of interest. That is not the right construction of the Act, nor is it justified by authority, as appears from Dalison's Settled Estate, In re.—p. 246.

COTTON, L.J.—It is not at all like Hotchkin's Settled Estate, In re, where the work was done without any scheme having been submitted either to the trustees or to the Court. STIRLING, J.—Questions arising under the Settled Land Act as to ordinary repairs, as in Tucker's Settled Estates, In re, which was referred to, are of a totally different order. The result is that the trustee is to be recouped the expense [of work required to be done under the Public Health (London) Act, 1891] out of the corpus.—p. 67.

BYRNE, J.—In exercising such discretion [under sect. 15 of the Settled Land Act, 1882] the Court should endeavour to ascertain what is fair as between the tenant for life and remainderman, having regard to the nature of the work done, and in every case the question must depend on the circumstances—see Tucker's Settled Estates, In re. It is pointed out also in that case that the expenses in respect of matters which are incidental to the ordinary use and enjoyment of the property ought not to be thrown on the remainderman. I do not think that I ought to apply any different principle in determining the rights as between tenant for life and remainderman because the money has been expended by the trustees and not by the tenant for life. The case of Barney, In re, differs from the present, as there the property was freehold, and the testator had provided that the parties beneficially entitled to the rents and profits of any of his houses should see that the same should be kept, or that they should keep the same in good and absolute repair, and properly insured from fire, and there was not, as in Clarke v. Thornton (56 L. J. Ch. 302; 35 Ch. D. 307, post, col. 3103) a power to the trustees to expend money in improvements, nor as in this case in effect a provision that all the incidental expenses and outgoings occasioned by retaining the leaseholds unconverted should be deducted from rents and profits before the amount payable to the tenants for life should be ascertained. In Lever, In re, the property was leasehold, the case was not complicated by a clause as to incidental expenses and outgoings, and the money was paid under stress of actual proceedings under statutes. In both the last-mentioned cases the application was made, as in the present case, after the expenditure had been incurred.—p. 201.

BYRNE, J.—It has already been determined in Millard's Settled Estates, In re, that a prospective order cannot be made by the Court authorising payment by the trustees for work to be done under an approved scheme out of moneys not in their hands at the time when the order is asked for. . . . This case does not decide the point now before me, although it has an important bearing upon it from the reasoning adopted, and I will mention particularly one passage in the M.R.'s judgment where he says: "What is wanted is protection—that is, protection for those interested in the land; and as practical men we know that to authorise a thing to be done is quite different from approving it when it has been done." . . . The case of Bristol's (Lord) Settled Estates, In re, was on an application made under sect. 15 of the [Settled Land] Act of 1890, and determined that a prospective order could not be made under that section to take effect upon moneys which might thereafter arise, but in the course of his judgment Kekewich, J., in considering the meaning of sect. 26 of the Act of 1882, makes some observations showing that in his view the use of the words "to be expended" points to moneys in hand. . . . Tucker's Settled Estate, In re (supra, col. 3101), also an application under the Act of 1890, deals with the principle upon which the Court ought to exercise its discretion in respect of allowing the tenant for life to be reimbursed moneys he has expended without first submitting a scheme. The observations which have been referred to of the M.R. and Lopes, L.J., in that case, about the duty of a tenant for life to submit a scheme, must be read in view of the fact that it appears by the report that there were no capital moneys available at the time the tenant for life made the expenditure. . . . I think the observation of the M.R. [Millard's Settled Estates, In re] is to be read with regard to the subject-matter of the case before him, and that he is dealing with the case of safeguards provided by the Act before payment can be actually made, and not with the case of approval of a scheme.—pp. 237, 239.

BUCKLEY, J.—There was not in Clarke v. Thornton (supra), as there is here, a trust coming before the trust for the tenant for life and providing for payment of improvements out of income. There would have been such a trust if the trustees had proceeded or the Court had directed them to proceed in exercise of their power, an event which did not happen. That decision was followed by Stirling, J. in Stamford's (Earl) Settled Estates, In re; and again, in that case there was no trust for payment of improvements out of income before arriving at the amount payable to the tenant for life. The learned judge says that in Clarke v. Thornton "the will had thrown the improvements on the income." By this he meant, I think, that if they were provided for not under the Settled Land Acts, but by the exercise of the power in the will, they were thrown upon income, not that they were thrown by the will upon the income in any event. . . . These repairs and improvements cannot be provided for out of capital under the Settled Land Act, 1882, because they have been executed without first carrying in a scheme for their execution. The application must be made under sect. 15 of the Settled Land Act, 1890. Under that section there is a discretion in the Court—Cardigan (Countess) v. Curzon-Howe.—p. 474.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I rather gather from the argument to the V.-C. by Mr. Martin that the agent's house in that case [Houghton Estate, In re] was a farmhouse in which the agent lived, because he put it that it might come under clause ix. of sect. 25: "Farmhouses, offices, and out-buildings, and other buildings for farm purposes"; and the V.-C. seems to have thought so too. Of course, if that were so—if the agent's house was a farmhouse in which the agent was living—there is no difficulty about it; but if the agent's house in that case was what the agent's house in this case is to be—if the V.-C. meant to go that length—then I cannot say that his decision is in conformity with the Act of Parliament. I cannot find the building a new agent's house in any of the sub-sections of the Act which is before us. There remain the stables. There is nothing about stables in the Act of Parliament. . . . I think that [sect. 13, sub-sect. ii. of the Settled Land Act, 1890] might justify the expenditure of capital moneys in additions or alterations in stables if such additions or alterations were reasonably necessary or proper to enable the same to be let. But then I also agree with the view which has been taken by the Courts of first instance in other cases, that where there is no question of letting, you cannot spend capital for such purposes. Here Lord Gerard is not going to let this property, he is going to inhabit it himself; and I cannot differ from the construction put upon that sub-clause ii. in De Teissier's Settled Estates, In re, by Chitty, J., in which he says that there must be a present intention to let, if not an immediate prospect of letting, before any application under sub-sect. ii. can be properly made. I think that is a perfectly right and proper construction to be placed upon that particular clause.—pp. 259—260.

BUCKLEY, J.—In De Teissier, In re, Chitty, J., in the course of the judgment, says, "In my opinion there must be a present intention to let, if not an immediate prospect of letting, before any application under this sub-sect. ii. [Settled Land Act, 1890] can properly be made." And in Gerard's Settled Estate, In re, that sentence was read or referred to by each of the L.JJ. and approved, and I need hardly say that that is binding on me. But I do not think that in using those words the learned judge meant that there must be a present intention to find an immediate tenant. The facts in De Teissier, In re, and in Gerard's Settled Estate, In re, were that the tenant for life, who desired to have the money expended on the alterations, was in occupation of and intended to occupy the mansion-house, and was a person who had no intention to let. And if one looks at the interlocutory remarks of Chitty, J., in De Teissier, In re, it will be seen that he was using the expression "present intention to let" in contradistinction to a case where there was no intention to let. He says, "Additions and alterations such as these I usually consider proper, and allow under this sub-sect. ii.; but before this section can apply, there must be an actual letting in contemplation. In the present case, the tenant for life proposes to occupy the house." He is there contrasting the intention to let with the intention to occupy. And in his judgment he says, "I think it is clear, that if the tenant for life is residing in the mansion-house, or contemplates residence there, as this tenant for life does, he cannot under this sub-section ask for capital money to be spent in making any additions to or alterations in the buildings." In Gerard's Settled Estate, In re, in the C.A., where the L.JJ. were approving of those observations, I find that interpretation of Chitty, J.'s words approved by something in the judgments of each of their lordships. . . . LOPES, L.J., says, "Then there is De Teissier's Settled Estates, In re, in which case Chitty, J., held that the meaning of this section was this, that the thing in question must at the time be in contemplation to be let." I do not understand that to mean that it must be in contemplation to be let at the moment, but a thing to be let as distinguished from a thing to be occupied. The present M.R. says, "In my judgment, unless there is a present intention for a letting which does not exist in this case, sub-sect. ii. does not apply." I understand him to mean a present intention to let as distinguished from an intention to occupy.—p. 205.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from a decision of Joyce, J. It virtually . . . is an appeal from a decision of Buckley, J., in Clarke's Settlement, In re, and the question is whether a tenant for life is entitled out of the capital moneys, to have paid for him the expense of an electric installation. . . . It really comes to this : Is electric plant an addition to a building within the meaning of sect. 13 of the Settled Land Act, 1890? Buckley, J., has decided that it is not. Joyce, J., in an earlier case of Trefusis's Settlement, In re, without giving any reasons, allowed the expenditure out of capital for this purpose; but in this, a subsequent case, having Buckley, J.'s decision before him in Clarke's Settlement, In re, he elected to follow Buckley, J. . . . For my own part, I have great difficulty in differing from Buckley, J.'s view, which was based, not merely upon his own opinion, but upon an earlier decision of Chitty, J., in Gaskell's Settled Estates, In re (supra), where, although the words "structural addition" are not used, the learned judge seems to have considered that an addition to a building must be, in its terms, something in the nature of a structural addition. This view Buckley, J. adopted, although he says, perfectly truly, that the word "structural" is not used in the Act, and that the word "addition" is capable of a good many meanings. . . . I agree entirely with the observations of Buckley, J., in Clarke's Settlement, In re, as to electric plant, and of Chitty, J., in Gaskell's Settled Estates, In re, as to hot water and heating apparatus. They completely cover this case, as it seems to me.—pp. 561—563.

ROMER, L.J.—I also agree with the reasoning and the decisions of Chitty, J., in Gaskell's Settled Estates, In re, and of Buckley, J., in Clarke's Settlement, In re, and I think the principle of the decisions in those cases governs the present. . . . I am bound to say that I do not quite see how the learned judge in the Court below came to allow the expense of the erection of the dynamo-house, seeing, as far as I am aware, that the house was some distance from the mansion-house. It is difficult to see at first sight how it could be said to be an addition to, or alteration in, the mansion-house, or any previously existing buildings; but that point is, fortunately, not before us.—pp. 563—564.

JESSEL, M.R.—Those cases [Newman's Settled Estates, In re, and Drake v. Trefusis (post)] decide that as regards money in Court under the Settled Estates Act and other Acts, the Court will not allow it to be laid out otherwise than in the purchase of land except in one case, viz., the building of a house; and it is difficult to see how the exception arose. . . . It appears to me that the two cases to which I have referred show that the decisions as to laying out money in building are of this anomalous character. In Newman's Settled Estates, In re, the application was to apply a considerable sum in building a new house, and a small sum of 15l. 7s. 8d. in drainage. A number of cases were cited, and the application was allowed. . . . If nothing more had taken place I might have been embarrassed by the circumstance that the application was allowed in respect of drainage: but in Drake v. Trefusis the Court was asked to lay out money in both ways, that is, both in erecting new buildings and in repairs and permanent improvements of old buildings; and the case as regards the latter was very strong, because there had been a fire which destroyed a large part of the mansion-house on the estate, and it was proposed to apply the fund in reinstating it. But James, L.J., said: "We never intended to go further than this, that the expending money in building a house on a vacant piece of ground forming part of the settled property is in substance the same thing as buying a house; and that money to be invested in the purchase of real estate may therefore be properly applied in the erection of new buildings. Repairs and permanent improvements do not come within this principle. I am therefore of opinion that the proposed expenditure in reinstating the mansion cannot be sanctioned, nor any outlay in permanent improvements which do not put new buildings on the ground." That decides, therefore, that the only exception to laying out the money in the purchase of real estate is putting a new building on the ground; and it also decides that the rule applies where the money is held under the trusts of a will or settlement just as much so as when it arises under an Act of Parliament.—p. 526.

ROMER, J.—It was held in Mundy's Settled Estates, In re, by the C. A., that where an estate was settled by deed, and then subsequently, by a will, moneys were directed to be laid out in the purchase of land to be settled in the same way as the estate, the moneys could be applied as capital money under the Act on improvements on the settled estate; the short ground of the decision being that the settlement and will constituted one settlement under sect. 2, sub-sect. 1, of the Act of 1882. Following the broad principle laid down in that case, North, J., in Byng's Settled Estates, In re, held, where land was settled by will, and then by deed money was settled in trust to purchase land to be settled on limitations identical with those of the will (though not by reference to the will), except that two terms of years were interposed, that, when the trusts of the terms became satisfied, the will and deed constituted one compound settlement, so that capital money arising under the deed could be applied in paying the cost of improvements on the land devised by the will. It follows from these cases that in the case before me, if estate A. had been subject to the mortgage and not estate B., the fresh mortgage to pay off might have been on estate B. But it is said that the converse does not hold good, and though estate B. ought to be used for the purposes of estate A., yet estate A. cannot be used for the purposes of estate B. It appears to me that this distinction is unsound.—p. 178.

FARWELL, J.—Montacute (Viscountess) v. Maxwell was a case of fraud, the reduction of the agreement into writing having been prevented by the fraud and practices of the party to be bound. In the report of the case in Strange, Parker, L.C., says: "But such parol promise on marriage is sufficient consideration to support a settlement made agreeable to it after marriage. This has been frequently determined. So it is also sufficient consideration to establish a promise made in writing after marriage." Lord St. Leonards, in his work on Powers (8th ed.) p. 647, treats this as a mere dictum; and the editor of Eden's Reports, in a note at vol. i. p. 62, says that there is no decision to warrant such a dictum. The report of this case in Peere Williams, which was cited in Warden v. Jones [27 L. J. Ch. 190; 2 De G. & J. 76, see post, col. 3114], does not contain the second hearing of this case, in which this dictum is stated.—p. 626.

FARWELL, J.—With regard to De Biel v. Thompson and Hammersley v. De Biel (Baron), I would point out, with all respect, that Lord Langdale did not decide the case on the ground that a subsequent memorandum would satisfy the Statute [of Frauds], but said that the subsequent letter was either a sufficient note to satisfy the statute or a sufficient adoption of an ante-nuptial contract purporting to have been entered into by his sons in writing on his behalf; and, further, that Lord Cottenham, in Lassence v. Tierney [1 Mac. & G. 551 (see post, col. 3115)], expressly stated that his judgment in Hammersley v. De Biel (Baron) turned on part performance by acts other than the mere marriage.—p. 627.

STIRLING, L.J.—Further, Barkworth v. Young [26 L. J. Ch. 153; 4 Drew 1 (see post, col. 3113)] is an express decision that a contract in consideration of marriage may be enforced against a party who has signed a written memorandum of it after the marriage. There is no decision to the contrary, and there is much authority in the shape of dictum in support of it. In particular, I think that, although it may be, as Farwell, J., says, that the ultimate decision in Hammersley v. De Biel (Baron) turned on part performance by acts other than the mere marriage, nevertheless, the judgments of Lord Langdale and Lord Cottenham do show that those learned judges were of opinion that a verbal ante-nuptial contract in consideration of marriage could be enforced if a proper memorandum in writing were signed after the marriage.—p. 527. See also the judgments of V. Williams and Cozens-Hardy, L.J.J. And see "ESTOPPEL," vol. i. col. 1018.

V. WILLIAMS, L.J.—Warden v. Jones does not seem to me to be an authority for the general proposition that a post-nuptial settlement reciting that it was made in pursuance of an ante-nuptial agreement cannot be good. In the first place, in Warden v. Jones there was no recital of such an ante-nuptial agreement, and although Lord Cranworth may have expressed the opinion that, assuming the existence of an antecedent parol agreement, it was not sufficient to satisfy the statute so as to give consideration to the settlement made after the marriage in pursuance of such agreement, this is a very different thing from deciding that the settlement would have been void against creditors if it had contained such a recital.—p. 523.

STIRLING, L.J.—Spurgeon v. Collier (1758) 1 Eden 55, post, col. 159 and Warden v. Jones appear to me to be consistent with the proposition that an ante-nuptial verbal contract may be enforced against a party to it who has after marriage signed a written memorandum of it, and also against a person identified in interest with him, as I take his trustee in bankruptcy to be when he sets up, as here, the same defence as the bankrupt himself might have set up. They certainly do not establish the contrary proposition, nor, as I think, do the dicta in the judgments cover it. Truwell v. Shenton (supra, col. 3113) was decided with reference to another statute and a different class of cases, but is relied on mainly for the observation of Sir G. Jessel, M.R., that Warden v. Jones, being subsequent in date to Barkworth v. Young [(1856) 26 L. J. Ch. 153; 4 Drew 1, supra, col. 3113], overrules it, but, as he expressly says, "so far as the two are inconsistent." As I have just said, I think there is no inconsistency between Barkworth v. Young and Warden v. Jones.—p. 527.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—A settlement, in no way referring to the parol contract, cannot be a note or memorandum thereof, nor can the marriage be regarded as a part performance sufficient to take the case out of the statute. This, as it seems to me, is all that was decided by Lord Cranworth in Warden v. Jones: and Lord Cranworth's dictum, upon which Farwell, J., relies, creates no difficulty when it is remembered that he was dealing with a case in which the plaintiff was asserting that the settlement was "void as against creditors," and was therefore in a better position than that of the settlor.—p. 529.

MONROE, J.—It is now settled beyond all question that if a married woman, known to the other contracting parties to be rich, were to execute a deed, and then refuse to acknowledge it, her refusal to fulfil a contract which, by the express provisions of a statute she was not bound to fulfil, could not be considered a fraud on her part: *Lassence v. Johnstone v. Mappin (1891) 60 L. J. Ch. 241; 64 L. T. 48.

KEKEWICH, J.—Let me assume that Mr. Mappin stated in the plainest terms that he would allow his daughter 300*l.* a year—whether by way of advance against this or that is immaterial. What relief can be founded on such a statement? The plaintiffs rely on Hammersley v. De Biel [12 Cl. & F. 45, supra, col. 3111], but in truth it tells against them. There is no pretence here of writing required by the Statute of Frauds, and without that representations such as here alleged cannot be enforced unless the party to whom they were made has done something on the faith of them to justify the interference of the Court. This is clear from the decision of the H.L., apart from Lord Cottenham's lucid judgment in Lassence v. Tierney.—p. 243.

COZENS-HARDY, J.—A mere representation that the writer intends to do something in the future is not, though the person to whom it is made relies upon it, sufficient to entitle that person to obtain specific performance or damages

There must be a contract in order to entitle the party to obtain any relief. This seems to me to result from the judgments of the H.L. in Hammersley v. De Biel (supra, col. 3111), Jorden v. Money, and Maddison v. Alderson [(1883) 52 L. J. Q. B. 737; 8 App. Cas. 467]. . . . It [the letter] is not, as in *Hammersley v. COZENS-HARDY, J.—It [the letter] is not, as in Laver v. Fielder, a statement that the writer would "adhere to" a "proposition" previously made. . . . The words are not "her share," as in *Laver v. V.-WILLIAMS, L.J.—Moreover, there is the opinion of Lord Cottenham in his judgment in De Biel (Baron) v. Thompson (ante, col. 3111), when that case was before him as L.C. . . . Lord Cottenham says: "I am aware that in Randall v. Morgan Sir W. Grant suggests a doubt, whether a written promise after marriage to perform a parol agreement made before could be enforced; but in Hodgson v. Hutchinson (ante, col. 3113), Taylor v. Beech [(1749) 1 Ves. sen. 297], and Moravute v. Moravell (ante, col. 3110), it was held that such a subsequent written promise would be binding within the statute." It does not seem to me that anything that was said by Lord Cottenham, in Lassence v. Tierney (supra, col. 3115), as the grounds of his decision in Hammersley v. De Biel (Baron) (ante, col. 3111), can get rid of what he said as a dictum, in which he deliberately differed from Sir W. Grant's doubt in Randall v. Morgan. It is to be observed that in the H.L. counsel abandoned the Statute of Frauds point. In my judgment the balance of authority, as well as reason, supports the view of Kindersley, V.-C., in Barkworth v. Young (ante, col. 3113).—p. 524.

MALINS, V.-C.—Prole v. Soady can hardly be considered as a very distinct authority, because the decision of Stuart, V.-C. was appealed from, and, as I well remember, the L.JJ., finding a difficulty, declined to decide it one way or the other, and said that there had better be a compromise, and a compromise was accordingly made. But there is a remarkable difference between that case and this, as Mr. Dickson, who was decided by Stuart, V.-C., to be bound by his contract to make the settlement upon Mrs. Prole, never made any subsequent settlement, though Mr. Prole did make a subsequent settlement. . . . I had lately before me . . . First v. First (post, col. 3121), where a letter was written the very day before the marriage, and then, without anything more having been done, the marriage took place. I could not do otherwise than come to the conclusion that the marriage had taken place upon the faith of the letter.—p. 365.

STEPHEN, J.—Both Lords Cranworth and St. Leonards point out that in Mawnsell v. Hedges (supra, col. 3119) there was no contract at all, and they decide the case on that basis. ROMILLY, M.R.—It was said that the words were too vague and ambiguous, and that no distinct meaning could be put upon them, and Kay v. It is not necessary to consider what the effect would have been in this case if the words had been "a share" instead of "her share" of the property.—p. 368. See ante, col. 3117.

GIFFARD, L.J. said the subject-matter of the covenant could not be ascertained till the death of the covenantor, as it only dealt with the property of which he should be seised or possessed at his death; and, in addition to this it was obviously a contingent covenant which made it not so favourable for the respondents as was the state of things in Jones v. How and Needham v. Smith (supra), for in the event of there being children who should die in the lifetime of the daughter leaving issue, those children or their issue could take nothing, as the covenant was only to take effect in case E. A. Brookman should survive her father, or dying leave any child or children. The rule of law was perfectly plain that a person who entered into a covenant of this kind was not bound to do more than to make a will in the terms of the covenant. . . . There was nothing in the covenant which bound the testator to make his will in such a way as would prevent a lapse.—p. 141.

COTTON, L.J.—The C. [in Mornington v. Keane (supra)] says this: ". . . The observations in Freemoult v. Dedire render that case, as it appears to me, an important authority, as exhibiting the distinction between a covenant to charge specific lands and one to charge lands generally. There the testator had covenanted to settle his lands in Romney Marsh, and also lands that should be of the value of 60*l.* per annum, upon his wife for her life; and it was held that the former part of the covenant created a charge, and that the latter did not." Why? Because it was not all his lands at a particular place but lands of the value of 60*l.* a year, and that could not be ascertained without evidence, and therefore left the lands indefinite.—p. 539.

STIRLING, J.—Burridge v. Row was also a case of a marriage settlement. The trust property consisted of two sums of 5,000*l.*, one secured by the covenant of the husband and policies of assurance on his life; the other by the bond of the father-in-law. The trusts of the former were for the wife for life, with remainder to the husband for life with an ultimate reversion in default of children of the marriage (which event happened) for the husband, his executors, administrators, and assigns. The husband became bankrupt, and the father-in-law purchased the husband's interest in the 5,000*l.* coming from the latter, and afterwards himself became bankrupt. It was held that the assignee in the bankruptcy of the father-in-law could not take any interest in the fund which had arisen from the policies brought into settlement by the husband without satisfying what was due under the father-in-law's bond. . . . Corr v. Corr was again a case of a marriage settlement, where a husband conveyed leaseholds to trustees and executed in their favour a bond for 2,000*l.*, being the amount of the wife's fortune which he had received. Under the trusts he took a first life interest determinable on bankruptcy—an event which happened. It was held by the C. A. that the trustees were entitled to retain the income of the leaseholds until the amount of the debt due to them on the bond was made good.—pp. 558, 559.

PORTER, M.R.—There was a claim against the assets of a testator who was a party to a marriage settlement, and he had granted an annuity or jointure charged upon certain lands to the intended wife, in case she should survive him and her husband. In the deed the testator described himself as entitled in fee simple to the lands charged, and he in fact thought he was owner in fee. He really had, however, only a life estate, as was discovered on the consideration of a difficult and obscure title after his death. Consequently the jointure was not charged on the lands at all, and therefore was incapable of enforcement against the lands. The deed did not contain any express covenant for title; but it did contain a proviso that it should be lawful to enter and distrain for the annuity; and, inasmuch as the grantor's estate having failed, the right to distrain did not exist, it was contended that the covenant was broken, and the jointress was entitled to come against the personal estate; and the H. L. so held. They did not all agree. Lord St. Leonards, who dissented, treated the case as being a perfectly clear one, and stated his views with a fine arrogance and perfect confidence, saying that he was right, and regretting very much that his learned colleagues did not agree with him. But though he may have been right up till that time, he cannot be held to be so now, and the decision binds everyone. His judgment is mainly based on the fact that the deed in question was a marriage settlement, and that in such a document there is, by the settled practice of conveyancers, no covenant for title and no personal liability intended. But the H. L. decided that there was an express covenant, which was broken; and that the measure of damages was the amount of the arrears of the jointure. In that case it was held that the mere grant of an annuity—charged on the lands—gave the grantee a personal remedy.—p. 325.

CHELMSFORD, L.C.—The language ascribed to the Lord Keeper in that case is no doubt very strong. The Lord Keeper is reported to have been of opinion, that, although no lands were mentioned in the articles, yet the covenant should be a lien upon the land, whereof H. Breary was then seised, unless he had purchased and settled other lands within the time limited by the articles, and which were not settled on the second wife, who came in as a purchaser without notice. There appears, however, to me strong grounds for thinking, on a careful examination of the registrar's book, that the report is not accurate. There seems reason for thinking that the covenantor had taken steps to reduce the general covenant to a specific one. Moreover, this case has not the authority of a decision, owing to the circumstance that there was no decree except one by consent. I am not prepared to say, that in the absence of any other authority, even if there had been no explanation of this case, I should have felt myself bound by it.—p. 315.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—In Mornington v. Keane, Lord Mornington covenanted that he would, on or before a specified day, either by a charge on freehold estates in England or Wales, or by an investment in the funds, or by the best means which might be then in his power, secure the payment of an annuity to a trustee for his wife. The L.C. did not doubt that the covenant would entitle the covenantee to have it performed in specie, but still it was held by the Court that the covenant of itself created no lien on the covenantor's property.—p. 548.

JAMES, L.J.—The primary object of a covenant to settle the future property of a wife is to prevent its falling under the sole control of the husband, and it, therefore, primâ facie, is to be supposed not to be intended to apply to property the wife's title to which does not accrue until after the husband's death. We have consulted the L.C. [Lord Selborne] on the case, and he agrees with us in the opinion that in the absence of any expressions showing that a covenant of this nature was intended to have a more extended operation it is to be construed as if the usual words, "during the said intended coverture," had been inserted. It appears to his lordship, as well as to us that the rule laid down in Dickinson v. Dillwyn and Carter v. Carter is to be followed, and not the rule which was acted upon in Stevens v. Van Voorst (supra).—p. 100.

 BUCKLEY, J.—I have to determine what in this settlement is the meaning of the expression "during the said intended marriage." In Edwards, In re, the C. A. had to consider what was the true effect of a covenant to settle after-acquired property without any limit of time. The Court held that if no contrary intention appeared it ought to be construed as applying only to property acquired during the coverture. . . . The C. A. therefore laid it down that the object of a covenant of this description is to exclude the husband.—p. 31.

 WOOD, V.-C.—Graffey v. Humpage, relied on by Mr. Turner in support of the claim of the executor, is, however, distinguishable in what seem to me material points from the present case; it was a case of ante-nuptial settlement, and the apparent intention of the settlement was to give all future property which should accrue to the wife, or in her right, to her disposal; and Lord Langdale, admitting the difficulty thrown in his way by the words in that case, which were, "in case the intended wife, or the husband in her right, should at any time or times thereafter, during the said coverture, succeed to the possession of, or acquire any property," thought the effect of those words might be obviated by the construction which he suggested, that the inchoate right vested in the husband by the coverture, continued during the coverture, and was only completed by the death of the wife into a possessory right, which must have relation to the inchoate right. In the present case this principle is inapplicable, for the deed of December, 1854, refers only to property which should thereafter devolve on the wife during the joint lives of the husband and wife; it could not have been intended to refer to any property in right of the wife, which had already devolved; for if so, such property might have already been spent by the husband.—p. 293.

Lane* (supra), Stuart, V.-C. considered that I had expressed a doubt whether Blythe v. Granville was properly decided. Now, that was a case of a reversionary interest, and Sir L. Shadwell held, that it came within the meaning of the covenant; and I had not the smallest idea of intimating that I felt the smallest dissatisfaction with that decision, and I am of opinion that a reversion which falls into possession does come within the covenant. The objection I made applies to one part of the judgment, in which he says, "The covenant, therefore, plainly applies to that property which the wife would become entitled to as soon as the coverture took effect. The coverture was the futurity referred to; and immediately on the marriage taking place the wife became entitled to the property during the coverture." The reasoning, therefore, is, that though she was entitled before coverture, yet after coverture she is become entitled during coverture, and therefore there is a change of condition; and from that I ventured most respectfully to dissent. And this appears from the report of Wilton v. Colvin in the Law Journal. From that report of the case, it is clear, that the only observation I made intimating any dissent, related to that particular part.—p. 913.

SELBORNE, L.C.—Now far be it from me to say, that a context, or an intention discovered from those extrinsic facts and circumstances which are legitimately to be taken into account, might not lead to the conclusion, that what was meant was only that property, which the wife should afterwards acquire, and in which the husband should succeed to the rights or become subrogated to the rights so afterwards acquired by her. Many circumstances might justify such a conclusion. Authorities have been referred to in which such a conclusion was arrived at. I will mention one of them by way of illustration only—such a case as Hoare v. Hornby, where all the parties were contracting with each other with equal knowledge that the wife was then entitled under two known wills, the one English and the other American, and they expressly made the settlement of the property under the English will and said nothing whatever about the American, and there was a general covenant of this sort in words of futurity. I think it was a very reasonable thing at all events, even if the words "if any," which are words of uncertainty, had not been added, to construe that as meaning only what the husband should acquire a right to by reason of an after-acquired title of the wife.—p. 7.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The case is not like *Hilbers v. In that case the interest of the tenant in tail was one and indivisible; and if the covenant did not extend to the estate tail, it could not extend to an inseparable part of it.—p. 605.

COTTON, L.J.—Then reliance is placed by the trustees (respondents) on Williams v. Mercier. But, in my opinion, that case must have turned on this, that the covenant there was the only part of the instrument which could bring into settlement the property to which the wife was entitled at the date of the settlement. There were words in the settlement declaring the trusts of the money to arise from the sale of certain chattels, which refer to the settlement contained in the proviso as to that property to which the intended wife was then entitled, and that could not be found anywhere except in this covenant; and there being a great variance in the words their lordships held, affirming the C.A., that the covenant did apply to the then present property of the lady. The words of the settlement, but unfortunately not the whole of the settlement, are set out in the H.L.'s report, and there is also a reference to the trust of the money to arise from the sale of certain property. What I gather from the report, although the settlement is not set out, is confirmed by the recollection of Lindley, L.J., that there was nothing in the settlement, except the covenant, which could affect the then present property of the ladies. The interpretation of the covenant, and the fact I have last mentioned, are alluded to in the judgments both of Lord Blackburn and Lord Bramwell; and, I think, also alluded to by the then L.C., Lord Selborne. Having regard to the context, and having regard to the terms of the settlements, it was held to apply to property which the intended wife had at and immediately before the date of the settlement. In my opinion that is not the true construction of this covenant and of this settlement, having regard not only to the covenant but to the contract.—p. 305. LINDLEY and LOPES, L.JJ. concurred.

PORTER, M.R.—Williams v. Mercier turned to a large extent upon the clause which provided for the application of the proceeds of the sale of after-acquired property in connection with the words "now is" occur, and which the lords regarded as throwing light upon otherwise ambiguous language. What the decision would have been without that clause it is not easy to say with complete certainty. There are expressions in the judgments I have read, which seem to point in different ways. But Williams v. Mercier came to be considered in Garnett, In re, Robinson v. Gandy. The facts of that case were peculiar. [The M.R. stated the facts and referred to the judgment of Cotton, L.J., and continued:] It therefore cannot be said that Williams v. Mercier is an authority for the proposition that per se, and without any context, the covenant would have bound property to which, at the date of the settlement, the intended wife was entitled. On the other hand, there is in the case before me no recital, as in Robinson v. Gandy, of an intention to settle "future" property.—pp. 242, 244.

COTTON, L.J.—The cases on marriage settlements give us no assistance when we look at the language used in the covenants. In Clinton's Trusts, In re, the words were, "become entitled." The principle laid down is that these words are satisfied if there is some change of some sort or other in the title, but the actual decision does not help us at all, for Wickens, V.-C. held, on the construction of the covenant, that the words "become entitled" must mean "become entitled in possession," and not otherwise.—p. 406.

JESSEL, M.R.—In Young v. Smith and Ramsden v. Smith (2 Drew. 298, post, col. 3142) the covenant was to settle the after-acquired property of the wife, and the real question was, what property was included in the covenant. The property which was to be the subject of the covenant was described in general terms, and the question in both cases was whether the covenant was intended to apply to a legacy bequeathed to the wife subsequently to the marriage. But those cases have no application to the case now before me, where the property agreed to be settled is specifically described, and there is, therefore, no doubt whatever as to what property is included in this covenant. The agreement by the husband that he would settle this particular property was clearly binding on the wife, she having assented to it by being a party to the agreement.—p. 179.

STIRLING, J.—But the cases most resembling this are two. The first is Lee v. Lee (col. 3136), a decision of Sir G. Jessel. There by an ante-nuptial agreement which was signed by the intended husband and wife and the parents of the wife, the parents agreed to appoint a share of certain real estate (which was subject to their life interest and to the appointment of them and the survivor of them) to the daughter; and the husband agreed that he would settle such share as his wife might take in the property, either by appointment or in default of appointment. It was there held by the M.R. that notwithstanding that there was no express covenant on the part of the wife, nevertheless she was bound. . . . That was a case in which the property, which was the subject of the agreement, was the specific property of the wife. But in De Ros' Trust, In re, Kay, L.J. applied the same doctrine to a covenant which was expressed in general terms. The difference between that case and the present is this, that although the covenant was on the part of the husband alone, yet the acts which were to be done in pursuance of the covenant were expressly to be by the wife as well as the husband.—p. 429.

KAY, J.—In Atcherley v. Du Moulin a marriage settlement contained a covenant to settle which the Court held included all property to which at the date of the settlement the wife was "entitled." At that date the wife was contingently entitled under a bequest to all the daughters of her father living at his death who should attain twenty-one or marry. The father died in 1854. This daughter had married in 1846, and her husband had died in 1851. Lord Hatherley held, that "although she had the transmissible contingent interest, she had nothing during the marriage which could be called property to which she was entitled." . . . "The word 'entitled' might be large enough to include a contingent interest;" but upon regarding the whole of the settlement, he thought in that case it did not.—p. 64.

CHITTY, J.—Another case that has been mentioned is that of Brooks v. Keith, where the question had reference to certain property which was given in such a manner as to render it, according to Kindersley, V.-C.'s judgment, doubtful whether, if the property was held to be included in the covenant, it would not be forfeited under the terms of the will. . . . The V.-C. . . . seems to have founded his decision upon the view that the assignment would create a forfeiture. . . . If that is the ground, as I rather think it was, of the V.-C.'s decision, I think it is a decision entirely consistent with principle. There is another ground which is not noticed in the judgment, though it is noticed in the text-books with reference to this question, namely, that the covenant there was so framed as to make it apply only so far as the husband was interested in the property. I take it that upon that form alone, although not referred to in the judgment, the decision might be supported.—p. 279.

That was a case in which the wife was entitled at the date of the marriage "to a contingent interest in remainder in real estate, and was also entitled in possession to two sums of stock." That is a remarkable distinction, because the V.-C. held that with regard to the contingent interest in the real estate it was bound by the settlement, but the property to which she was entitled absolutely was not bound.—p. 627.

That does not apply to such a case as this; where the wife was contingently entitled to the property at the time of the marriage, and never during the coverture acquired an interest in possession.—p. 12.

JESSEL, M.R.—The authority which is certainly binding upon me is Mackenzie's Settlement, In re; and when that case is carefully considered it will be seen to be an authority that words like those [i.e., in an ante-nuptial settlement, "that if at the time of the solemnisation of the intended marriage the wife shall be, or if at any time thereafter, and during the joint lives of the husband and wife, she, or her husband in her right, shall become beneficially entitled to any real or personal property, estate or effects, for any estate or interest whatsoever, then and in every such case the husband and wife and all other necessary parties shall, as soon as circumstances will permit," assure such property to the trustees in trust for sale, and to hold the proceeds upon the trusts thereinbefore declared of the wife's trust funds, "or as near thereto in all respects as the deaths of parties and other circumstances will admit"] do include a reversionary interest as distinguished from an interest in possession. [After referring to the facts of the case and quoting from the judgments of Turner and Cairns, L.JJ., his lordship continued:] So that this is an express decision that property to which the lady was entitled in reversion was covered by the words "property to which she now is entitled for any estate or interest whatsoever." It is not an express decision that defeasible reversions are within it; but there is a dictum of Turner, L.J.'s, not only as to vested, but contingent or executory interests, which shows what his opinion was upon the subject. The very point did come before me, though it does not appear to have been argued, in Sweetapple v. Horlock [(1879) 48 L. J. Ch. 660; 11 Ch. D. 745, 748.—See "POWERS," ante, col. 2207] . . . The words were not "so soon as circumstances will permit," but "after such interest shall fall into possession." Although the point was not argued, I certainly gave judgment upon it. There was a preceding power of appointment, and I said this: "Miss H. being thus entitled, in default of appointment by her father, to one-half of the settled property, married Mr. S., and being of age she and her intended husband entered into the following covenant with the trustees of their settlement." Then I read it. "The words are: 'now is . . . interested in or entitled to any real property.'" I leave out all the other words. "She certainly then was interested in or entitled to a contingent reversionary interest." The word "contingent" I used inaccurately for "defeasible." The passage should therefore run: "She certainly then was interested in or entitled to a defeasible reversionary interest in real property under her father's and mother's settlement. Moreover, the covenant is to settle upon trusts, which show at once the parties contemplated reversionary property, because it directs what is to be done with any interest which shall 'fall into possession.'" So that I clearly considered that the reversionary interest was comprised under the words "now is,"—p. 198.

KAY, J.—In Mackenzie's Settlement, In re, where the covenant included everything to which the wife was entitled at its date, and she was then entitled in reversion after the death of her mother to a share of Consols, and her mother died during the coverture, Turner, L.J., said in effect, "that if she was entitled contingently the covenant would reach it," à fortiori as she had a vested reversionary interest. This was followed in Cornwall v. Keith (supra, col. 3138), where the interest was in remainder expectant on the death of the wife without issue; this contingent reversionary interest was bound. It appears, therefore, that the Courts have hesitated to hold the word "entitled" in such a covenant to include a contingent reversionary interest under such a limitation as "to the children of A. living at his death," though now that would probably be held to be included. But this, so far as I know, is the furthest extent to which the construction of that familiar covenant has gone.—p. 65.

JESSEL, M.R.—Dering v. Kynaston is a very peculiar case. There the wife had an estate tail in remainder after other estates tail, and her interest happened to be a very remote one indeed. It was not a contingent interest, but a vested estate tail in remainder after the failure of several prior estates tail; and in the events which had happened it was most improbable that she would ever come into possession. That may have influenced Lord Romilly's decision.—p. 196.

COTTON, L.J.—It was contended that Mainwaring's Settlement, In re, showed that we ought to give effect to the intention of the donor, if he has said that the property was not to come into settlement. Undoubtedly there are expressions used by the learned judge who decided that case which support such an argument, but what the decision comes to is this, that, looking to the trusts of what was in that case given to the lady, it was not property which could, on the true construction of the covenant, be considered coming within it.—p. 100.

BOWEN, L.J.—Mainwaring's Settlement, In re, decides no more than this, that property does not fall within the covenant to settle after-acquired property if it is given in such a way that it will not fit in with the trusts of the settlement.—p. 102.

FRY, L.J.—The same question arose for consideration in Allnutt, In re. Chitty, J. there cites the observation of Wood, V.-C. to this effect. "She therefore," that is the donor, "means to say, I do not intend this portion of my daughter's property to be comprised in her settlement; I intend that she shall take it upon this express condition, that it shall not be settled." Upon that Chitty, J. made this observation: "I respectfully dissent from that proposition, and I think I ought on principle to dissent from it, if it is meant that I am to regard the testator's intention when it is expressed in some manner which is not legally binding. Taking the whole judgment together, I think the V.-C. intended to decide, as a question of construction of the will, that the gift was such that it did not fall within the scope of the covenant, in other words, that it did not fit the covenant. That may be treated as a question simply of a construction of the will, and if so, of course the decision does not bind me in any way." In those observations of Chitty, J. I entirely concur.—p. 103.

PEARSON, J.—But I differ from Mr. Cookson's argument in another respect. He cited a passage in Sir G. Jessel's judgment in Smith v. Lucas, in order to show that the lady could not confirm this [deed], because she had no power of disposing of the reversionary interest during her coverture. To my mind the disabilities of infancy and the disabilities of coverture are very different. The disability of coverture is an absolute disability, in a case of this kind, to dispose of her reversionary interest. The disability of infancy goes no further than is necessary for the protection of the infant, it leaves the infant the power to make the deed in the first instance; but, for the protection of the infant, it gives the infant also the right to avoid that deed if the infant finds it right and proper so to do when the infant comes of age. Therefore, to begin with, the disabilities are not in pari materia. But, in addition to this, I do not think the M.R. meant to say that which Mr. Cookson thought he did say in his judgment. In that case the lady had executed a deed after she came of age and while she was under the disability of coverture, which deed purported to bind her as regarded her future acquired property. What the M.R. decided there was this—not that she could not confirm a deed which she had executed whilst she was an infant if it needed confirmation (which it did not), but that she could not, after she had been married and was under coverture, execute a deed by which she should bind herself for the future never to disturb the deed which had been executed while she was an infant, with regard to property which was then reversionary, and of which as a married woman she could not dispose. That is a very different proposition. That is merely saying this: What it is attempted to bind you by is an act which amounts (if it amounts to anything) to a disposal of your future property which, as a married woman, is something which you cannot do, and, if you cannot dispose of it, you cannot contract to dispose of it. He says this (p. 545): "I think that the power of disposal given to a married woman as regards her separate property is simply a power to dispose of existing property, and not a power by contract, or quasi-contract—for she cannot strictly contract—to dispose of other property while she is a married woman. In other words, I shall hold that the contract by a married woman, while married, to convey all her future-acquired separate estate will not bind that separate estate when acquired—that her power of disposition does not extend to that. It seems to follow that no confirmation by her of a settlement executed by her when an infant, and containing such a contract, will effectually bind her as regards the property not then acquired; that is, not in existence at the time of the confirmation. That disposes of the deed." But he admits that she can elect, a point which I really have not got to consider here, because, as I say, the deed remained unavowed and the deed remaining unavowed at the time of the death of this lady, it bound her property, though it did not bind her personally.—p. 424.

CHITTY, J.—There [Stonor's Trusts, In re] there was an ante-nuptial agreement to settle after-acquired property, and the wife, when a feme sole, was bound by the contract. There was an exception as to property which was settled and limited to the separate use and disposal of the wife. In substance Pearson, J. held that the operation of sect. 5 (Married Women's Property Act, 1882) could not be so applied to the excepted property, as to bring in property which was not limited by any instrument to the separate use of the wife, but only gained the character of separate property by virtue of a subsequent Act of Parliament. In regard to the substance of the decision, if I may say so, it appears to me to have been right, because the learned judge had before him the case of a covenant by a married woman which bound the property. It was a question of construction, as I read the whole case, and he may have considered that it was not intended that she should take advantage of the subsequent general statute so as to assert that the property fell within the exception. There are some observations of the learned judge which point to the decision being on the general construction of sects. 5 and 19, but I have had this case very fully and carefully argued, and if it was intended, which I think it was not, by the learned judge to give the wide and extensive meaning to sect. 19 which the respondent's argument before me would carry, then I should respectfully dissent from the judgment.—p. 790.

NORTH, J.—There was this distinction between that case [Stonor's Trusts, In re] and the present, that there the agreement was a joint one by the husband and the wife; the wife was bound by it as well as the husband. . . . The settlement [in Queade's Trusts, In re] was expressed in terms which were binding on both the husband and wife, but the wife was not in fact bound by it, because it was a post-nuptial settlement, and she was an infant at the time when it was executed. It was exactly the same thing as if there had been no agreement by the wife; and the case was thus distinguishable from Stonor's Trusts, In re. Chitty, J. held that the wife's share under the intestacy became by virtue of sect. 5 [Married Women's Property Act, 1882] her separate property, and that it was excepted from the settlement. . . . In that case [Whitaker, In re], by an ante-nuptial settlement executed in 1873, the husband and wife had jointly covenanted to settle any after-acquired property of the wife, except jewels, &c., or any sum not exceeding in each case the amount of 1,000*l.*, or any property settled to her separate use. Under the will of her father, who died in 1884, the wife became entitled to a sum of 10,000*l.*, which was not limited by the will to her separate use. The C. A. held that the operation of sect. 5 of the Act was modified by sect. 19, and that, reading the two sections together, the share taken by the wife under her father's will was not made by sect. 5 her separate estate so as to come within the exception in the covenant. There, no doubt, the covenant was a joint one by the husband and wife, and not a covenant by the husband alone, as in the present case. But, looking at the reasons given by the L.JJ. in their judgments, it seems to me that it would have made no difference in their decision if the covenant had been by the husband alone, and that I must arrive at a different conclusion from that of Chitty, J. in Queade's Trusts, In re.—p. 83. . . . Lopes, L.J., in giving judgment [Whitaker, In re], said: "I do not think there is any serious difficulty in deciding the point which is now before the Court. The testator here did not leave the property in question to the plaintiff for her separate use. Therefore the property in question is not within the exception in the marriage settlement, and was [not] subject to that settlement." The insertion of the word "not" (above placed in brackets) is evidently a clerical error; the L.J. clearly meant to say that the property was not within the exception, and was subject to the settlement.—p. 85.

BUCKLEY, J.—In Queade's Trusts, In re, the settlement was a post-nuptial settlement made in the year 1847 between the wife, who was an infant, the husband, and the trustees. It contained an agreement and declaration by the parties, and a covenant by the husband that all future property of the wife should be settled. In 1883—that is to say, after the passing of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882—the wife became entitled as one of the next-of-kin to a share of undisposed of residuary estate. There, as here, the wife was at the date of the deed an infant, and there was therefore no settlement by her. Chitty, J. held that sect. 5 of the Act of 1882 was operative in those circumstances, and that the wife was entitled. In Hancock v. Hancock that case was disapproved. The C. A. held that according to its true construction sect. 19 of the Act of 1882 prevents sect. 5 from interfering with any settlement which would have bound the property if the Act had not been passed. The argument that "settlement" in sect. 19 must mean settlement which is binding upon the wife was advanced and failed. The settlement in that case did not contain any covenant by the wife or any joint declaration or agreement. Subsequently in Stevens v. Trevor-Garrick, Chitty, J. held that in a case where not sect. 5 of the Act, but sect. 2 was the relevant section, the principle of the decision of the C. A. was equally applicable. In this state of things it appears to me that the decision in Queade's Trusts, In re, is gone altogether. . . . The case therefore seems to me to be parallel with that of Holles v. Carr (post), referred to by Lord Romilly in Young v. Smith (post).—p. 650.

KAY, J.—In *Hardey v. It was argued that the case was not one for specific performance; but Lord Langdale maintained the covenant, and directed performance of it as against the assignee of the husband, by conveyance of certain real property in Ireland to which the husband had become entitled since the marriage.—p. 113.

ROMER, J.—Lewis v. Madocks seems on examination to have been decided on a covenant very different in substance from the present one. It was a covenant by a man to settle the whole of his personal estate, however acquired; and to such a covenant very different constructions apply. Lord Eldon did, in fact, point out that income received by the husband would not be bound by the covenant, but he did say also that if income became capitalised it seemed to him that it would become bound. I do not think that his decision went to this extent; but the expression of opinion to this effect is there. Nevertheless, that expression of opinion should, I think, be limited to the case before the Court—the case of a covenant which was very different from the present one. Further, I think that what Lord Eldon meant by “capital” was what was held by the covenantor in such a way as showed an intention on his part of making it subject to the covenant. But whether this be so or not, the covenant was wholly different to the present one, and the decision thereon is not binding on me in this case. . . . In the report of this case [Bendy, In re] in the Law Reports gives correctly all the facts, then, with great deference to Kekewich, J., I do not follow his reasoning; and if the case had come before me I should have decided it otherwise. But I cannot help thinking that there were circumstances in the case which do not appear in the report, and which induced the Court to decide the case as it was decided. There must have been some such circumstances, for I observe that one effect of the decision was that property which was expressly excepted from the settlement, and had been sold and reinvested, was thereby made subject to the settlement.—p. 349.

But, if the power has first been exercised, I do not see what effect the gift over in default of appointment can have upon it. . . . There [Steward v. Poppleton] there was an absolute gift out and out to the wife, and the power of appointment was subject to her absolute interest. If in that case the words had been “to such use as she shall appoint, and subject thereto for her absolutely,” I should have considered it as conflicting with Bower v. Smith.—p. 801.

ST. LEONARDS, L.C.—This is a peculiar contract, and, before giving my judgment upon it, I shall again look at Sir A. Hart's decision in Power v.
Sheil. I confess, however, that I do not understand the observations attributed to him, to the effect that an adult female cannot in equity contract herself absolutely out of dower. In my opinion there can be no doubt whatever of her right so to contract previously to her marriage, and to bar herself of all dower or thirds that may accrue to her from her husband's estate.—p. 216.

 ST. LEONARDS, L.C.—In Vizard v. Longdale,
 . . . there was no statement that the provision was intended for the jointure of the wife, whereas in the present case there is an express recital that the sums paid and to be secured were for a "competent jointure and provision of maintenance." I think it very clear, therefore, that the words used in the settlement before me are in themselves sufficient to operate in this Court in lieu of dower; but whether in the events which have happened they ought to be so construed is a different question.—p. 216.

v. WILLIAMS, L.J.—With regard to Spurgeon

v. Collier, Northington, L.K. came to the conclusion that the proof of a parol promise before marriage failed; and the opinion expressed by the L.K., that even if such promise had been proved to have existed it would not have supported a settlement made after marriage, was not necessary for the decision of the case. The case had nothing to do with creditors. The plaintiffs were not claiming through Collier, but against him, and the question was whether the rights of the plaintiffs against Collier in respect of the Hillingdon estate were to be defeated by an alleged purchase for value by some defendants named Alston, to whom Collier purported to convey in consideration of marriage. There was no recital of an ante-nuptial agreement, and the Court held that the attempted proof of an ante-nuptial agreement, failed in fact, and consequently that the deed was voluntary. The recital would not even have been evidence against the plaintiffs. . . . Trowell v. Shenton was a case in which it was held that an ante-nuptial agreement by an infant was not sufficient to take a post-nuptial settlement in which no reference is made to the ante-nuptial agreement out of the operation of 27 Eliz. c. 4, and that such post-nuptial settlement was therefore void against a subsequent purchaser for value. . . . The case was really decided on Lord Tenterden's Act, and not on the Statute of Frauds, and the result was that, there being no ratification in writing of the promise made during infancy, the conveyance purporting to be made in pursuance of that promise was voluntary, and void under 27 Eliz. c. 4, against a subsequent purchaser.—pp. 523, 524.

NORTH, J.—The observations made by Lord
Campbell in Coulson v. Allison, to which Lord Selborne referred in Ayerst v. Jenkins (supra), are precisely in point. It is true that those observations applied to the case of a transaction not completed, and were said to be inapplicable to a case of a transaction perfected by conveyance. But the reason for Lord Selborne's decision was that the person claiming to set aside the settlement was the representative of the settlor, whom equity would not have assisted to get rid of his own settlement. Lord Selborne in citing Rider v. Kidder, a decision of Lord Eldon, said that such a settlement would be void
as against creditors, but he held that equity would not assist the plaintiff. In the case before me I have not to consider what the position would be if the heir-at-law of R. Sloper, or his infant heir, were plaintiff. It is the trustees of the settlement who, finding that they have rents on their hands payable under the trusts of a settlement, come to the Court asking to whom they ought to be paid. I can find no estoppel, such as existed in Ayerst v. Jenkins, against the administrator and infant heir, to prevent the Court from giving the assistance asked for.—p. 402.

MALINS, V.-C.—Had it not been for the case of Ayerst v. Jenkins, I should have had no hesitation whatever. That was a suit to set aside a settlement instituted by the personal representatives of the settlor, whereas this is a special case for the opinion of the Court, and in that case the illegal consideration for the settlement was not apparent upon the settlement. Then the property was vested in trustees for the absolute and unconditional benefit of the lady, without any interest being reserved for the settlement until the marriage, and without any trust in favour of children. The only motive expressed upon the deed was that the settlor was desirous of making a provision for the lady, and the instructions given by the settlor to his solicitor to prepare the deed were that it should be a "deed of gift," although the form of the instrument prepared in pursuance of the instructions was varied. There it was a completed transfer of specific chattels, and the suit was not instituted till ten years after the death of the settlor, and after the lady had been married for some years to another man. The lapse of time was a material ground for upholding the settlement.—p. 206.

DENMAN and HAWKINS, JJ.

HAWKINS, J. (for the Court).—The observations of Hatherley, L.C. [Bayspoole v. Collins] tend to show that special reasons had prompted the Court to hold that a very small and inadequate consideration was sufficient to support a settlement under the statute of Elizabeth [27 Eliz.
c. 4], reasons which have no existence in such a case as the present, and which therefore justify us in thinking that the question, what is a voluntary settlement under the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, is not to be determined simply by a consideration of what would be held to be a bona fide conveyance on good consideration under sect. 4 of the statute of Elizabeth.
Price v. Jenkins (post, col. 3163) was also a case under the statute of Elizabeth, which throws no further light on the subject.—p. 264.

BACON, C.J.—No doubt there are a great many cases arising upon settlements in which the Court has endeavoured to ascertain what is and what is not an unfair transaction, by deciding the question what is a merely voluntary assignment. I have no inclination to interfere with any of those decisions, and least of all with the decision in Price v. Jenkins. . . . But what has that case to do with the Bankruptcy Act, in which there is a special provision that a settlement made by a trader within two years of his bankruptcy, unless it is made before marriage, or in favour of a purchaser or incumbrancer, in good faith and for valuable consideration, shall be void as against the trustee in bankruptcy?—p. 623.

JAMES, L.J. (in the C. A.).—Price v. Jenkins was a decision upon the statute 27 Eliz., and the object of it was to prevent a fraud.—p. 626.

JESSEL, M.R.—I give no opinion whether I should have come to the same conclusions as the judges who decided Price v. Jenkins. Treating that case as well decided, I think it has no

BOWEN, L.J.—I will only add one word with regard to the argument upon Price v. Jenkins, although it is not necessary to decide the point. Price v. Jenkins was a case in which there was an assignment of leasehold property with a liability to perform certain covenants attached to it, and it was held that the assignment was therefore a conveyance for valuable consideration. It does not follow that if there is in the same deed a conveyance of freeholds as well as an assignment of leaseholds, the decision in Price v. Jenkins establishes that the liability to the covenants in the leaseholds is sufficient to support the concurrent conveyance of freeholds as being a conveyance for valuable consideration. As at present advised, I think that to hold so would be to be imposed on by a piece of sealing-wax. We often find that what is in form one contract contains several perfectly separable contracts, and to hold that a conveyance of valuable freeholds can be made a conveyance for valuable consideration by throwing into the same piece of parchment a little bit of leasehold would be taking a most unfair advantage of a decision which was never meant to decide anything of the kind.—p. 25.

KAY, J.—In Price v. Jenkins, the C. A. held that an assignment by way of settlement of leasehold property which contained no covenant on the part of the assignee to pay the rent or perform the covenants was nevertheless an assignment for value, so that it could not be destroyed by a subsequent sale of the leaseholds by the settlor under 27 Eliz. c. 4, James, L.J. saying, that the quantum of consideration was of no consequence. This was followed by the chief judge in bankruptcy in Doble, Ex parte (post col. 3165). In the later case of Hillman, Ex parte (supra, col. 3163), it was held that such an assignee was not a purchaser within the meaning of sect. 91 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869. The late M.R., Sir G. Jessel, then observed, "That a voluntary conveyance is fraudulent is entirely judge-made law. The later judge-made law of Price v. Jenkins corrected the former, so far as was possible at that time." James, L.J. observed, "Price v. Jenkins was a decision upon the statute 27 Eliz., and the object of it was to prevent fraud." In Ridder, In re (post, col. 3166), both Bacon, V.-C. and the late M.R. speak somewhat doubtfully of the decision in Price v. Jenkins, and hold that such a settlement could be voluntary as against the creditors of the settlor, under the earlier statute of 13 Eliz. c. 5. Cotton, L.J. agrees in this, but speaks of Price v. Jenkins as a binding authority. In Marsh and Granville (Earl), In re (supra, col. 3164), Bowen, L.J. intimated an opinion that if there were in the same deed a conveyance of freeholds, the acceptance of the burden of the leasehold property would not be a consideration as to them. This is anything but a satisfactory state of the law, but it compels me to hold against my own opinion, that this settlement, so far as regards the leaseholds comprised in it, was not voluntary.—p. 930.

KERKEWICH, J.—A more difficult argument to deal with is this, that that decision [Price v. Jenkins] is limited to cases under the statute of 27 Eliz. I cannot myself see that on the face of the report. It was a case under that statute, and no doubt there have been cases decided since (Hillman, Ex parte (supra, col. 3163), Ridler, In re (supra, col. 3163), and I think also Green v. Paterson (supra), in which the Court seems to have treated Price v. Jenkins as applicable to cases arising under that statute, and no other); but my difficulty is this, that I find no judgment of the C. A. anywhere saying that that is so. What has been said is no doubt consistent with that view; and it may be that when they are compelled to consider the matter they may hold that view; but they do not say so: and when I find, for instance, Cotton, L.J., in Green v. Paterson referring to Price v. Jenkins, not at great length, but still at sufficient length for the purposes of the case then before him, and giving some account of it, and referring to it as decided under the statute of 27 Eliz., but not saying in so many words that it is applicable to cases under that statute and to none other, I do not think that I am competent to supply those words and to say that it is applicable to no other cases. In Irish cases, where apparently the judges are not bound by the decision of the C. A. here, they have gone the other way and thought themselves at liberty to decide differently. It would not be right for me to listen to those cases, because they would have no authority here as against the decisions of our own C. A.—p. 82.

Toker was chiefly relied on for the purpose of showing that the quantum of consideration ought not to be considered. In that case the question at issue was whether a settlement was fraudulent and void as against a subsequent bona fide purchaser of the settled estate under the stat. 27 Eliz. c. 4. . . . It establishes no more than this, that in the case before them the L.J.J. thought the consideration being bona fide, a good one to support the conveyance then impeached, that is, a good one to support a contract; it decided no more than this, that the conveyance in question came within the proviso contained in sect. 4 of the statute of 27 Eliz. c. 4, as being made upon good consideration, and bona fide, and so not fraudulent and void under sect. 2 of the same Act (pp. 263, 264). . . . Rosher v. Williams . . . though it affords an illustration of what will not suffice to bring a case within sect. 4 of the statute of Elizabeth, and is expressive of the V.-C.'s views and approval of Townend v. Toker, does not assist us to any conclusion.—p. 266.

Therefore, there is the authority of one L.C. in its favour, and the authority of another L.C. against it. Consequently it is not a decision that binds.—p. 325.

JESSEL, M.R.—The case of Goodright d. Humphreys v. Moses (supra) was this: [His lordship stated the facts and continued:] The question was whether the deed of 1747 was a voluntary conveyance. It was said the only consideration that could be considered to pass to the wife by the deed of 1747 "was the certainty of maintenance for herself and children during the life of her husband, which is not a legal but only a moral consideration." The remarkable part of the trust was that for the support and maintenance of Harris and wife, and their children, during the life of Harris. Then, afterwards it was for the maintenance of Elizabeth Harris and her children during her life. It seems to have been forgotten that Harris gave up something; he would have a life estate, and an estate by the curtesy, and he came under a legal obligation to maintain the wife and children. He might have been under a legal obligation that was personal to a limited extent to maintain his children under the Poor Law Acts, but this was a new obligation certainly. Having cut down, therefore, what was before a life estate, he had this limited interest. Therefore he gave value, and that seems to have been forgotten altogether. The wife had nothing during his life, and her estate, no doubt, was cut down after his death; she got less than she fec. It seems to have been assumed that the value given by the husband was immaterial, and not to be considered. There is not a word said about the value he gave. In the next place it is said that the certainty of the maintenance by the husband was not a legal but only a moral consideration. The mistake was this: she had a right to be maintained by her husband. That was the legal right, but only out of his means. This gave her a right to be maintained out of the estate, even although he had become bankrupt, or anything else. It is clear, therefore, that was a valuable consideration. However, we get this judgment, as reported at all events, from De Grey, C.J., "That the deed of 1747 was only a voluntary conveyance within the true meaning of the stat. 27 Eliz., being founded only upon a good and not upon a valuable consideration." With the greatest possible deference it was clearly valuable consideration, but the point that the husband gave value was not argued at all. In fact the points as to giving up the life estate, and as to his parting with his control over the alienation of the estate were not argued. That was altogether missed, and as to the value on the part of the wife, she clearly gave value. Then he says that it therefore cannot be set up against a bona fide purchaser. That is all that is said upon the point. It appears to me, therefore, it cannot be considered a decision on a point that was neither argued nor referred to in the judgment; and although I entirely differ from the judgment, if I may say so, thinking that it is erroneous, even on the point that was submitted, yet it might be from its great age and recognition binding upon me, even if I thought it was wrong; but it was not binding upon me as to a point that was neither argued nor decided. Then the next case referred to was Currie v. Nind (supra), which was a decision of Lord Cottenham, when he was M.R. I confess, speaking humbly, that I do not understand, altogether, or follow the judgment. But I am clear that the case did not call for a decision upon this point. [His lordship, having stated the facts, continued:] It was said that the settlement of 1774 was purely voluntary; and, inasmuch as the settlement was made under the power, as far as the fee was concerned, it is difficult to see why it was not. The husband's concurrence was not required in order that the married woman should exercise an equitable power. She could exercise that alone. His life estate was provided for; and, therefore, he certainly gave no value. His concurrence was not value, because it was not wanted, and he did not give up his life estate, or rather estate during the coverture. On the contrary, it was enlarged. He got a survivorship estate. So that he gave nothing, and, therefore, how it could be a settlement for value one does not exactly see. The wife had power to appoint to whom she pleased, and the appointment was voluntary as far as she was concerned. It was only dealing with the copyhold inheritance after the life estate had expired. It seems to me that it was plainly voluntary. But it was argued in all sorts of ways, and the only point I have to consider is, What is the judgment? The M.R., after referring to the objections raised by the purchaser, says this: "Upon the second and third objections I am of opinion that the property in question, being the property of a married woman, and the settlement being made during her coverture, does not prevent the stat. 27 Eliz. from operating upon it." Whatever this is worth, I do not exactly know what it means. It does not apply to the fine. If he means that by a married woman executing a power and thereby making a conveyance that is voluntary, I agree with him; but if he means anything else, I do not know what it means. Then he says, "Goodright d. Humphreys v. Moses is decisive as to this; and no objection is made to the surrender as not being sufficient to pass such interest as the wife could by these means part with." What that means I do not know. She had only an equitable interest. That did not pass by the surrender at all, but by the prior deed. It was neither made better nor worse by her surrender. Then he says, "That copyholds are within the statute is now fully established by the late case of Doe d. Tunstall v. Buttrick (supra, col. 3167)." Whatever the value of that authority may be, it does not decide the point before me, and is not so intelligible as I should have expected a judgment of that great judge to be.—pp. 90—95.

[His lordship then referred to Butterfield v. Heath, and did not comment upon the judgment of the M.R., but discussed Hewison v. Negus (post), a judgment of the same judge, which was, he said, exactly to the opposite effect, and was, he thought, right in principle. It was followed in Teasdale v. Braithwaite (post), and his lordship decided in accordance with the two latter cases.]

BACON, V.-C.—Then, according to the decision in *Hewison v. LORD SELWYN.—The case which has been mainly relied upon as an authority for allowing this appeal is one in the Court of Ex. of Dickenson v. Wright (29 L. J. Ex. 151) which was affirmed in the Court of Ex. Ch. under the title of Clarke v. Wright. . . In the Court of Ex. Ch. their lordships find a very great conflict of opinion among the judges, and plainly the majority of the judges would have been for reversing the judgment below if they had not taken the same view of Newstead v. Searles (supra, col. 3172) and Clayton v. Wilton (Lord) (supra, col. 3171) which was taken by Channell, B. . . Under those circumstances it appears to their lordships to be their duty to advise Her Majesty in accordance with the view which they themselves take of Newstead v. Searles and Clayton v. Wilton (Lord), and which was taken by the H. L. in Macfie v. Herbertson (9 App. Cas. 303, supra, col. 3171). The order of the limitations in both those cases was such that the limitations which were not within the marriage consideration were covered by those which were, so that those which were within the marriage consideration could not take effect in the form and manner provided by the instrument, without also giving effect to the others. It was on that ground, and not from any special favour to provisions for the benefit of children who were not issue of the marriage, that their lordships consider both those cases to have been determined. If similar circumstances should occur again it may be inferred from what was said in the H. L. in Macfie v. Herbertson, that the same principle would be applied; and, indeed, the principle seems to be clear, for the settlement in any such case could not be defeated without defeating the interests of children unquestionably within the consideration of marriage. There is no authority for the proposition that under the statute (27 Eliz. c. 4) a particular limitation can be picked out of the middle of a settlement, or the shares of some persons who would take pari passu with others according to the terms of the settlement picked out, in order to be destroyed, in favour of a subsequent purchaser; leaving subsequent or concurrent interests of persons who were within the consideration of marriage under the same settlement undisturbed. The only question in their lordships' view which remains is whether in this case there are special circumstances which bring it within the principle of Newstead v. Searles and Clayton v. Wilton (Lord), so understood. . . Their lordships think . . . that there are not in this settlement any special provisions sufficient to bring it within Newstead v. Searles, and that the Court below was right in holding the case to fall within the general rule. —pp. 68, 69, 70.

De Mestre v. West [1891] A. C. 264; 60 L. J. P. C. 66; 64 L. T. 375; 55 J. P. 163.—P.C. SELBORNE, EARL OF.—The general rule has long been settled, that a voluntary conveyance, even though from the most honest motives and the most moral considerations, may be defeated, according to the construction which has been placed upon the stat. of 27 Eliz. c. 4, by a subsequent conveyance to a purchaser for value such as was made in this case. It has also been determined in a manner which it would be too late now to attempt to review—in the case, amongst others, of Sutton v. Chetwynd (Lord), and in the Irish case of Cormick v. Traupud, both decided by the H. L.—that this rule is applicable to limitations in favour of volunteers under marriage settlements. Therefore, as the law is so settled, some special reason, consistent with that law, must be shown for taking any particular case out of the rule. Whether their lordships would have established such a rule had the matter been new is not the question.—p. 267.

Paul v. Paul (1880) 15 Ch. D. 580; 50 L. J. Ch. 14; 43 L. T. 239; 29 W. R. 281.

MALINS, v.-c.—Davenport v. Bishopp was a contract between the husband and wife to settle any after-acquired property which the wife might become entitled to; but it being the wife's property, the contract was that, if there were no children of the marriage, then it was to go to the wife's niece. The suit was instituted by the husband, after the death of his wife, to have the trusts carried out by the conveyance of an estate, which the wife had become entitled to during her life, to the uses of the settlement. Then, on the question whether the decree for specific performance should be confined to the life estate of the husband, or should extend to the limitation to the niece, it was held that it should extend to the niece, on the ground that the right of the husband to a specific performance of the contract drew with it the right to a specific performance of the whole, at least as against the heir of the settlor, whatever it might have done against a purchaser for value.—p. 589.

NORTH, J., after discussing at length Barrow v. Barrow, Wilder v. Pigott and Hodson's Settlement, In re, continued: Therefore those three cases are quite clear and intelligible. There was a deed that an infant could enter into, subject to avoiding it after attaining twenty-one. An infant might choose not to avoid it, but, on the contrary, to be bound by it; and the fact that the infant on attaining twenty-one was married did not prevent that. There is one other case that has given me more difficulty in dealing with—that is the decision of Stirling, J., in Greenhill v. North British, &c. Co. There the facts were very different from those in this case; but I must say, on reading that case carefully, that the learned judge does seem to have come to the conclusion that there were sufficient acts done in that case to enable a woman to bind the reversionary interest in personality, while she was covert. He says: "In the present case an agreement for a settlement was come to before the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Greenhill, and but for the provisions of the Statute of Frauds that agreement would have been completely binding on all parties. That statute prevented any action being brought on the agreement against Mrs. Greenhill, though she might have brought an action to enforce it against Mr. Greenhill"—that is, because he signed it and she did not, she not being bound at the time. "She did not bring an action, but by her acts she recognised the agreement, and elected to have the benefit of

it. To such a state of things the principles laid down in Barrow v. Barrow and Wilder v. Pigott appear to me to be applicable." . . . But those two cases do not seem to me to bear on it for the reasons I have just mentioned; because those were cases where an infant was bound subject to avoiding the deed, and nothing could be chosen but to avoid the deed. In the case before Stirling, J., Mrs. Greenhill was not an infant, no doubt; but, on the other hand, she had never executed the deed or signed the agreement, and therefore she was not bound. However, in that case Stirling, J. came to the conclusion that Barrow v. Barrow and Wilder v. Pigott were authorities that enabled him to come to the conclusion, upon the facts, to which he did come. I do not see that those cases really applied to that case or apply to this, although, no doubt, his decision may have been perfectly right, having regard to the different state of circumstances which was said to amount to confirmation in that case.—p. 428.

RIGBY, L.J.—All these cases are alike in one respect. The parties to a marriage settlement, or what was equivalent to it, chose to bargain as to what should take place in the event of a future separation of the spouses. There can be no doubt that such a bargain is absolutely bad. All that was there held was that, if persons chose to bargain about an event which they are not entitled to anticipate, their bargain will be bad. And in Cartwright v. Cartwright, in the C. A., this was carried so far that where a father was settling property on the marriage of his son, and he stipulated that, if a separation should take place between the husband and wife, the income should, from the time of the separation, during their joint lives be paid to the husband, the Court held that the son could not gain an advantage dependent upon the separation, which in fact afterwards took place. It was said that the son could not derive any interest under the fraudulent act of another, and that it was a fraud on the law for the father to enter into such a stipulation. I cannot see any resemblance between the present case and any of those three cases. They are perfectly intelligible in principle, but it is, I think, equally clear that the principle does not apply to the present case.—p. 171.

V. WILLIAMS, L.J.—In all three cases cited by Mr. Haldane there was to be found on the face of the instrument an express bargain for that which was contrary to public policy.—p. 171.

ROMER, L.J.—With regard to the point of so-called public policy, I need only say that there is nothing whatever contrary to public policy in a settlement providing or contemplating that a tenant for life may validly marry more than once, nor in its providing that, if he does, he may exercise certain powers over the settled property in order to provide for the wife and children of his subsequent marriages. Such a settlement is perfectly valid, and there is nothing in it contrary to public policy. The cases cited have nothing whatever to do with the case now before us.—p. 173.

v. WILLIAMS, J.—I have not forgotten or failed to look at the cases of the character of Freeman v. Pope and Mackay v. Douglas (supra), in which it was held that, where a man who nowadays settled his property in contemplation of entering upon a hazardous trade, that was a settlement made for the purpose of defeating and delaying creditors, although there might be no creditor in existence at the time when the settlement was sought to be voided who was a creditor at the date when the settlement was made. But I do not think that the mere fact that a man is of extravagant habits at all brings the case within Freeman v. Pope, or creates any tangible probability that the man may become insolvent.—p. 116.

STIRLING, J.—Provision there was made by deed for securing 600*l.* in trust that the wife should have the interest during her life, and afterwards that it should be paid to such daughter or daughters as should be begotten by the husband or the wife, such payments to be made at their age of eighteen or marriage. A daughter had been born at the date of the execution of the deed, and no daughter was born afterwards, and the question was whether that daughter took. There the doctrine as to procreantis and procreandis is cited, and although the words of themselves imported futurity, the Court came to the conclusion that another meaning was given to them, expressly to avoid caprice and unintelligible disposition.—p. 399.

WOOD, V.-C. said that the only case for restricting the word "issue" to children in a deed was that of Swift v. Swift. There it was almost impossible to construe it otherwise; and the name articles were executory, which brought the case nearly to that of a will. This being a deed, he did not feel justified in cutting down the word "issue."—p. 959.

CHELMSFORD, L.C.—Hodgeson v. Bussey was the case of a settlement, which, although it was executed, yet being evidently a provision for the children, showed a plain intention that it should not vest in the wife absolutely; and the super-added words, such as "executors, administrators, and assigns," showed clearly that "heirs of the body," which were those used, were not meant as words of limitation.—p. 506.

THESIGER, L.J.—The first of these classes is the one where the word “then,” the adverb of time, is attached to the description of the class, and in that case, as in Wharton v. Barker (supra) and Long v. Blackhall (3 Ves. 486), it was decided that the word “then” imported that the class was to be ascertained at the time so pointed out, i.e., at the period of distribution. Wheeler v. Addams (supra) is to a certain extent an exception from that rule, but I think that may be explained, because we find in that case there is in the limitation an exception of the tenant for life, on whose death the limitation was to come into force. This showed that the class must be ascertained at an earlier period than his death. . . . The third class of cases is where the word “then,” the adverb of time, is used, but where we find it used, not in connection with the description of the class, but in connection with the time at which the estate is to come into being. In that class of cases, also, without any exception, we find that it has been decided that the class is to be ascertained at the time of the testator's death. That is to be found in Cable v. Cable (16 Beav. 507), Bullock v. Downes (9 H. L. Cas. 1), and in Day v. Day; and it is to be observed that in all these cases we do not find that any distinction is drawn from the fact of the use of the words, “as if he had died intestate.”—pp. 329, 330.

KAY, J.—In Pinder v. Pinder (supra, col. 3191) the trusts of a settlement were, for the husband for life, wife for life, children of the marriage, and if none, for the wife, if she survived, but if the husband survived, then, after his death, for the appointees of the wife, and in default, for the person or persons who, under the statutes made for the distribution of the estates of intestates, would then be entitled to the personal estate of the wife in case she had survived her husband and had died possessed of the same intestate, and to be divided among them according to the statute. Lord Romilly held that the word “then,” if it stood alone, might be read “thereupon,” or “on that occasion,” but that the additional words, “in case she had survived her husband and had died possessed of the same intestate,” showed that the class intended to take were the persons who would have been her next of kin if she had died immediately after her husband. In . . . Chalmers v. North, where the words were the same, his lordship came to the same conclusion. On the other hand, in Druitt v. Seaward, where the words were, “In trust for such person or persons who, under or by virtue of the statutes made for the distribution of estates of intestates, would, on her decease, have been entitled thereto in case she having survived her husband and had then died possessed thereof and intestate,” the next of kin of the wife at her own death were held entitled, although she had died in the lifetime of her husband. This was followed in Bradley, In re, where the limitation in a settlement, after trusts for the wife during joint lives, then for the husband for life, were for the wife absolutely if she survived, but if she died in the husband's lifetime, in trust for her appointees, and in default “for the person or persons who, under or by virtue of the statutes,” &c., “would, on the decease of the” wife, “have been entitled thereto in case she had survived the” husband, “and had then died possessed thereof intestate,” &c. In the two last-mentioned cases the learned judges who decided them did not profess to adopt the grammatical construction of the words, but held that the object was simply to exclude the husband; and for this reason they considered the wife's next of kin at the actual time of her death were intended. With great respect, adopting that theory, I see no reason for arriving at such a conclusion.—p. 533.

BOMILLY, M.R.—The meaning to be attached to the word "unmarried" is controlled by the authorities, and, particularly by Norman's Trust, In re, which lays down a distinct and definite rule. The term "unmarried" bears a different meaning, according as it is applied to a person who is married or unmarried at the time. . . . V. WILLIAMS, L.J.—In my judgment, we must in this case give to the words "without having been married" their natural meaning. It has been argued that we ought not to do so, because when you are dealing with such an instrument as a marriage settlement there is a presumption that the parties intend to benefit the issue of the marriage, and that that presumption is so strong that it compels us to construe these words differently from their natural meaning—a presumption so strong that it binds us to construe "nunquam nupta" as if it were simply "in nupta." I cannot agree to that. It seems to me obvious that Lord Cranworth did not in Clarke v. Colls recognise the existence of any such powerful presumption. . . . But it is said that the presumption was recognised in Wilson v. Atkinson (see post, col. 3195). As a matter of fact there were in that case special circumstances which clearly justified the conclusion at which the Court arrived, without having recourse to any such presumption. But it is said that Knight Bruce and Turner, L.JJ., in their judgments recognised the existence of the presumption, because Turner, L.J. said that "even if it be necessary to construe the terms of the trust for the next-of-kin independently, and without qualifying them by the subsequent declaration, still in my judgment the trust for the next-of-kin ought not to be so construed as to exclude children," and that in either view the illegitimate child was entitled to the fund. Of course, if it could be shown that the C. A. did in Wilson v. Atkinson recognise that presumption, and did say that in all cases of construction of a marriage settlement, and especially in the construction of a clause for the ultimate distribution of the wife's property in favour of her next-of-kin as against her issue, whatever the words used might be, they ought not to be construed so as to exclude the issue of the marriage, we should be bound by that decision and must follow it. I do not forget that Chitty, J., in Stoddart v. Savile (post, col. 3196) considered that Wilson v. Atkinson had laid down such a general rule, and that it was decided by both the L.JJ. upon the basis of the supposed presumption. Notwithstanding that view of Chitty, J., which was certainly more or less shared by Fry, J., I do not think that we ought to regard Wilson v. Atkinson as having recognised that presumption.—pp. 90, 91.

ROMER, L.J.—Under the circumstances, I need not go through the authorities. They have been dealt with, and, if I may say so, very well dealt with, by Swinfen Eady, J., in Smith's Settlement, In re (supra, col. 3194). I agree that it is not easy to say exactly what Wilson v. Atkinson must be taken as having decided, except that the settlement was of a peculiar character, and that undoubtedly one of the grounds of the decision was the very peculiar circumstances of the case.—p. 95.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—Clarke v. Colls turned upon the construction of a clause similar to the present clause, except that the word used was "unmarried," and it was pointed out that the word "unmarried" was a word of dubious import, that it might mean either "spinster" or "widow," and that, taking it to include the latter, there was no reason why children who had not attained a vested interest should not take under the limitation to next-of-kin of the wife as if she had died unmarried. But Lord Cranworth, who with Lord Campbell formed the majority of the lords, expressly said that the result would have been different if the words had been those which are found in the present settlement. As to Wilson v. Atkinson . . . I need not say more than this, that the decision itself was plainly correct—indeed, I should have thought that the case was barely arguable. I agree with the view taken by Jessel, M.R., in Emmins v. Bradford (post, col. 3196), that Wilson v. Atkinson did not lay down any general principle by which the Court would be bound in construing any other document. I adopt the judgment of Jessel, M.R., in Emmins v. Bradford, and the judgments of the Irish M.R. in the two cases which have been cited [Hardman v. Maffett and Deane's Trusts, In re (supra, col. 3193)], and also the very recent judgment of Swinfen Eady, J., in Smith's Settlement, In re. No doubt there might be a context which would force the Court to give a different meaning to these words, and such a context was found in Wilson v. Atkinson.—p. 96.

SWINFEN EADY, J.—In Ball's Trust, In re, the settlement contained no provision for the issue of the marriage. It was not, as in the present case, a gift in default of children-taking a vested interest. Again, in Upton v. Brown, where the claimant was the son of the former marriage, Fry, J. gave (inter alia) the following reasons for his judgment: "Moreover, if I were to hold that this child is excluded, I must equally have held that his children were excluded if he had married and had died under twenty-one leaving children, and I must equally have excluded children of a third marriage of the mother, for whom the settlement makes no express provision." This latter reason which seems to have influenced the learned Judge I am unable to appreciate, because there could have been no third marriage unless the mother survived her husband, in which case the fund became hers absolutely. Of course the second marriage might have been dissolved, leaving the wife at liberty to contract a third marriage, but the learned Judge was not, as I think, referring to this contingency.—p. 378.

SWINFEN KADY, J.—In Emmins v. Bradford, Jessel, M.R. said: "In the present case I rest my decision upon this, that the words are free from ambiguity, and that there is no context whatever to control them." Emmins v. Bradford was a very strong decision, because the effect of it was to exclude living children of a former marriage; . . . Now, Emmins v. Bradford has been twice followed in Ireland in the cases referred to [Hardman v. Muffett (supra, col. 3193), Deane's Trusts, In re]; but in the English case of Stoddart v. Saville, Chitty, J. followed Fry, J. [Bull's Trust, In re, and Upton v. Brown (supra, col. 3196)]. It will be observed that in Stoddart v. Saville there was no trust for the issue of the marriage. The lady had left one child of the marriage, and the trust was not, as in the present case, a trust in default of a child attaining a vested interest. In addition to the cases in the Weekly Notes [Arden's Settlement, In re (supra, col. 3196), and Forbes, In re (supra)], to which reference has been made, there is the case of Mare, In re, in which Kekewich, J. considered himself bound by Wilson v. Atkinson (supra, col. 3195) as governing the whole question, and said it was a clear decision of the C. A. covering the exact case. The authorities, therefore, are certainly conflicting.—p. 379.

NORTH, J.—Now a great many exceptions to the general rule of law are given in Elphinstone, Norton and Clark on Interpretation of Deeds, but the only one referred to is, that "a fee may be limited by words of reference," for which Co. Litt. 9 C., and Garde v. Garde are cited as authorities. Lord Coke puts the case very shortly, and does not give the words of reference. Garde v. Garde, however, affords a good illustration of how words of reference supply the want of clear words of limitation; but can we find such words of reference in the present case? There are words of description—"the share and interest to which the said E. H. Hudson is entitled, &c."—but what is there to show for what interest it is conveyed? . . . "Share and interest" is a mere description of the parcels conveyed. There is nothing to indicate heirs, and nothing to incorporate the word from any other instrument, and the Court must deal with the words it finds, although the result is to disappoint the intention of the parties: Holliday v. Overton, Lucas v. Brundreth, Tatham v. Vernon, Middleton v. Barker. [See supra, col. 3198].—pp. 549, 550.

BACON, V.-C.—The only difficulty I have among all the cases which have been cited, is that presented by Morgan v. Morgan. But at the same time I cannot disregard Idle v. Cook (supra), where the decision plainly was, that, there being a gift to the husband and wife for their lives and afterwards to their issue, and a gift over in default of such issue, that had not the effect of cutting down the absolute unqualified fee simple which was given by the previous trust contained in the surrender. I do not find that that case engaged the attention of Lord Romilly in Morgan v. Morgan. The only observation I can find in it is "notwithstanding Idle v. Cook." That, in my opinion, can be answered and disposed of by recollecting that the words are different, that the words in this case are "without leaving issue," and in Morgan v. Morgan they were "without issue."—p. 651.

 PORTER, M.R.—The words "without leaving issue" led the learned judge [in Olivant v. Wright] to hold that the parties meant to create a fee simple, determinable in one event, i.e., of there being no issue living at the death of the tenant for life, an intention which would have been inconsistent with an estate tail. He does not purport to overrule Morgan v. Morgan. The rule on the subject is stated by Sir H. Elphinstone in his work on Deeds at p. 248, Rules 84, 85.—p. 83.

V. WILLIAMS, J.—Now, in form, the trust in the present case giving the husband the life estate with a gift over in case of alienation, is, in a settlement for valuable consideration, unobjectionable—see Detmold v. Detmold. Counsel for the trustee in bankruptcy spoke of it as the so-called authority of Detmold v. Detmold. I do not know why he said that. It is a decision of North, J., and he seems to have dealt with the very point; and I observe that in Macintosh v. Pogose (supra), which is the latest authority upon the subject, Stirling, J. refers to Detmold v. Detmold as a binding authority stating the law. Detmold v. Detmold decides that a settlement for valuable consideration in that form is unobjectionable. At all events, effect was given to the settlement notwithstanding the fact that subsequently to the alienation which divested the husband's estate the husband was made bankrupt. But it would seem that a clause giving a settlor a life interest until bankruptcy is void against creditors. The decision of Stirling, J., in Macintosh v. Pogose is an authority for this proposition. I gather from his judgment that it was an open question down to that decision, although Lord Cairns, in the H. L. had prior to that expressed an opinion that even in a settlement for valuable consideration such a proviso for determination of the settlor's estate would be void. I have not to decide that.—p. 114.

WOOD, V.-C.—In Gurly v. Gurly it was held that the words "in lieu, bar and satisfaction of any dower or thirds, which she could or might claim at common law out of all or any of the estates real, personal or freehold," of her husband barred the wife's claim under the Statute of Distributions, notwithstanding the addition of the words "at common law," the L.C. observing, that those words must mean the general law of the land, whether by statute or custom. Now the expression has only occurred once, without the addition of the words "real or personal estate." That is Colleton v. Garth (supra); but there the V.-C. does not give his decision at all upon the fact of personal estate not being mentioned. He says, that it is dower and dower alone that is in question; and looking to that settlement, there can be no doubt about it. An annuity was given charged upon land; it was called a jointure, and it was given as jointure, and in bar of "dower and thirds at common law." Though the annuity was not in law a jointure, still that was the term the settlor used and the sense he intended it to have, and a jointure would have deprived the widow of her dower or thirds at common law, and he was looking to real estate only. The case I have here is a case of provision out of real and personal estate.—p. 447.

KAY, J.—There the bill was filed by persons claiming under a voluntary settlement against a subsequent purchaser, who has paid his purchase-money to the settlor, seeking to make him pay it over again. But the settlement contained a power for the settlor to revoke the settlement and sell the property, and a covenant by him that the proceeds should be paid to the trustees of the settlement. The purchaser, therefore, as the settlement was revoked, was perfectly right in paying the proceeds to the settlor. The deed contemplated that any purchaser would do so. The covenant being voluntary could not be enforced in equity by way of specific performance, and the plaintiff, therefore, was not entitled to relief. Damages might have been obtained at law against the settlor for breach of the covenant, but he was dead insolvent. If the settlement had not contained a power of revocation, as the sale was an absolute sale of the property, the case would have been like Daking v. Whimper (post).—p. 395.

Simmonds v. Pallas (or Palles) (1845) 8 Ir. Eq. R. 335; 2 Jo. & Lat. 489.

SUGDEN, L.C.—It is said that the case is within the principle of Ellison v. Ellison, Pye, Ex parte [18 Ves. 149; see "TRUST AND TRUSTEE," post], and Pulvertoft v. Pulvertoft, which nobody can dispute, are clear law and binding in this Court. They would decide the case if Mr. Simmonds has a right as a cestui que trust under this deed. But that would be to alter the entire transaction, because this is not a voluntary settlement in which, without reference to the claim of Simmonds, the parties thought right to make him a cestui que trust as a volunteer by a deed, with an actual transfer of the fund, under which the relation of trustee and cestui que trust could subsist. This is not that case, but it is a transaction between A and B, the benefit of which, to a certain extent, C is to have, but not as a cestui que trust. I think it clear that the authorities binding this case are Garrard v. Lauderdale (Lord) [2 Russ. & M. 451, supra, col. 3204. And see "TRUST AND TRUSTEE," post], and that class of cases.—p. 344.

MALINS, V.-C.—There is no proposition so absurd that it cannot be supported by some supposed authority, so I am referred to Ellison v. Ellison, a decision of Lord Eldon's which draws the distinction between cases where there is only a voluntary covenant to do a thing and cases where the act is perfected; and it is laid down that the assistance of the Court cannot be had without consideration to constitute a party cestui que trust, as upon a voluntary covenant to transfer stock; but if the legal conveyance is actually made constituting the relation of trustee and cestui que trust, or if the stock is actually transferred, though without consideration, the equitable interest will be enforced. All that Lord Eldon lays down there is, that a voluntary settlement, when actually carried into effect, as binding as if there were consideration.—p. 588.

MALINS, V.-C.—As to Elwes v. Elwes, that was a case not seeking to set aside anything in a deed, but to insert a provision for raising 100,000*l.* for the benefit of daughters; and the Court came distinctly to the conclusion that there never was any intention that such a clause should be inserted.—p. 578.

MALINS, V.-C.—In Corley v. Stafford (Lord) the gentleman, who was a barrister, had been very many years on terms of great intimacy with the lady whom he was about to marry. She was eighty years of age, and he was twenty-four years younger. He undertook to prepare the marriage settlement, and accordingly he did prepare it, but he prepared it in a manner in which it ought not to have been prepared, giving himself a much greater interest than he ought to have had, or than it was the intention of the lady he should have. The point of the decision is that inasmuch as he undertook the duty of preparing the settlement, it was his duty to prepare such a settlement as a conveyancer would have approved, or the Court would have directed.—p. 18.

MALINS, V.-C.—Cases were cited by Mr. Glasse, with most of which I entirely agree, that where this Court corrects a settlement it must be because it is framed in a manner contrary to the intention of all parties. He cited Sells v. Sells, where the question was whether the future property of the husband was to be included. The wife's advisers understood it was; the husband's advisers did not so understand it. Therefore, as there was not a contract on both sides that the property of the husband should be included, that falls under the rule that you cannot correct a settlement where the intention of one but not the intention of the other party is shown. I have had cited to me Rooke v. Kensington (Lord), [25 L. J. Ch. 795; 2 K. & J. 753, see "MORTGAGE," ante, col. 1849]; Bradford (Earl) v. Romney (Earl) (post), and Fowler v. Fowler, and they all proceed upon the same principle.—p. 17.

COTTON, L.J.—In that case [Smith v. Iliffe] there was a marriage of an infant ward of Court long before the Infants' Settlement Act, and the settlement was one which the husband was required to make depriving him of the rights which he would otherwise get by the marriage; but after some years the lady came and said that this was not what she intended. That really could not alter the settlement. It was not her settlement; it was a settlement insisted on by the Court for her, and I think it is evident that the matter could not have been presented to the V.-C. in such a way that he could consider whether it was right under the circumstances to vary the settlement. For what he said was this: "The case before the late M.R. of Wolterbeek v. Barrow (23 Beav. 423, supra, col. 3212), though it proceeded on facts which are not present here, is an authority as to the jurisdiction of the Court." What was Wolterbeek v. Barrow? It was a case where on the instructions for the settlement being produced, it was found they were contrary to what was contained in the deed executed. Now no one for a moment doubts that where it is shown that the actual contract and intention of the contracting parties was different from that which is expressed in the deed, the Court has jurisdiction to alter it. But there is an enormous difference between altering a settlement under those circumstances, and altering a settlement where there is no evidence whatever that there was a different intention at the time when the deed was executed, as in the case here. In my opinion we cannot consider that this case in any way supports the contention of the respondent here. If it intended to lay down any different principle as regards settlements to that which has hitherto prevailed, all I can say is that, with great respect to the V.-C., I cannot follow Smith v. Iliffe.—pp. 515, 516.

Paul v. Paul (1880) 50 L. J. Ch. 14; 15 Ch. D. 580; 43 L. T. 239; 29 W. R. 281.—MALINS, V.-C., not followed.

Paul v. Paul (1881) 19 Ch. D. 47; 51 L. J. Ch. 5; 45 L. T. 437.

FRY, J.—The petitioners rely on the proposition that a settlor can revoke a trust which he has finally and conclusively declared in favour of a volunteer. This proposition is supported by the decision of my learned predecessor, Malins, V.-C., on a former petition in this suit which is reported. But for that decision I should have thought that the law on this subject was clear. I thought that a gift conclusively made to or in favour of a volunteer was incapable of being revoked by the donor, and I thought that one mode of making such a gift was by a completed declaration of trust in favour of the volunteer. In my opinion, the law has been conclusively settled in that way, and, therefore, notwithstanding the respect which I entertain for my learned predecessor, and the anxiety which I always feel to follow his decisions, I am constrained to make no order upon the petition.—p. 48.

KEKEWICH, J.—As regards the second point [that a bargain between father and son, if unfair, or unfairly effected, is not necessarily fatal to the entire arrangement] I need only refer to Hoghton v. Hoghton, where the Court was satisfied that there was a benefit to the father obtained without due protection to the son, and yet took pains to explain that in addition there were unreasonable provisions in the deed which assisted the Court to interfere. This is stated in a passage on p. 314, and is also, I think, a fair conclusion from the rest of the judgment, though it is sometimes difficult to determine whether the particular language should be more properly referred to the subject of re-settlements generally or exclusively to those in which the father gains a benefit. Lord Campbell read the judgment as I do: see Jenner v. Jenner (supra). Hoghton v. Hoghton was relied on in Turner v. Collins (supra) as an authority that a transaction between father and son must be set aside wholly if at all, and could not be rectified by striking out an improper provision. That was not a case of re-settlement, but the L.C. (Lord Hatherley) accepted the analogy, and held that rectification was possible as against a party admitting it to be proper, notwithstanding that the transaction stood as a whole.—p. 207.

KEKEWICH, J.—Where a man is seeking to set aside his own settlement, it is very hard to say, as against the trustees of the settlement, that they shall not have their costs. In Dutton v. Thompson, which was a case of a voluntary settlement, the V.-C. of the County Palatine gave judgment to set aside the settlement with costs against the trustee. And on appeal Jessel, M.R. said that, as the deed was set aside, there was no fund out of which to pay costs. But I think that later cases have modified that, and the strict rule that the fund was gone has not been held to apply.—p. 163.

ROMILLY, M.R.—Hunt v. Matthews went further than any other case on this subject in support of the settlement against the husband; it was difficult to reconcile it with the principles laid down in Strathmore (Countess) v. Bowles (supra, col. 3216). In Hunt v. Matthews, however, the Court sustained a settlement made by a widow after a treaty for a second marriage had commenced. The settlement was made in favour of her children by a first marriage.—p. 646.

 JAMES, L.J.—One of the earliest cases, if not the earliest, in which the absence of a power of revocation was relied on was Naldred v. Gilham. In that case the M.R. had with great clearness decreed in favour of the settlement, and although that decree was reversed by Lord Macclesfield, it is plain from his judgment, not only that he did not mean to lay down any such general rule as that contended for in the present case, but that he had no idea that such a rule existed. It is said that in Huquein v. Buseley (14 Ves. 273.—L.C.; see "PRAUD," vol. i. col. 1156) it was laid down that the absence of a power of revocation was strong evidence that the party did not understand the transaction. But that expression must be read in connection with the context. . . . In Nanney v.

Williams there was the conclusive circumstance that the settlor actually struck out the word irrevocably, and that the deed as it was executed contained a recital that the testator was desirous of revocably settling the property. In that case, moreover, the solicitor, who prepared the deed, took a life interest in remainder with remainder to his children in tail. But even in that case the learned judge did not consider himself warranted in declaring the deed void without a very careful and elaborate examination of all the surrounding facts and circumstances.—p. 445.

HATHERLEY, L.C.—It has, for instance, been almost laid down in Coutts v. Acworth (supra), that, where there is no power of revocation, the deed will be set aside; and Wollaston v.

Tribe and Everitt v. Everitt (post), have been relied on as favouring the same view. But whether there should be a power of revocation or not must depend upon the circumstances; and it cannot be laid down as a general rule that such a deed would be voidable unless it contained a power of revocation.—p. 247.

COTTON, L.J.—Wollaston v. Tribe was also the case of a marriage settlement, and there some years after the marriage, there having been no children, and the husband being dead, the lady came and gave evidence, showing that her instructions to her solicitor (she being apparently the only person who had taken part in the negotiations for the settlement) were not in accordance with the terms of the settlement. If the M.R. thought the evidence was uncontradicted and sufficient, it would be right to so decide, but I should very much hesitate to say that it was really acting in accordance with the principles which the Court has acted upon. It requires very clear and distinct evidence to show that there was some different intention at the time when the settlement was executed, and, with the exception of this, there is hardly a single case where many years after the settlement was executed, on mere parol evidence, uncontradicted because there was no one to contradict it, the Court has altered a deed because one of the parties afterwards desired that it should not stand as executed.—p. 14. LOPES, L.J. concurred. SIR J. JAMES, L.J.—But there is one case, and one only before the M.R., in which, as reported, the broad proposition relied on in this case appears to have been laid down. In Mountford v. Keene the M.R. is reported to have said that the decisions established that the burden lies on the person who takes any benefit under a voluntary deed of proving that the propriety of reserving a power of revocation was brought under the notice of the party at the time when he executed the deed; but it is not probable that the M.R. intended to lay down that which he is here reported to have said wholly irrespective of the consideration that "there was a set of relatives quarrelling over the poor enfeebled semi-paralytic old man," and of the other circumstances in that case, which might have well warranted the conclusion that it was not the deliberate act of a person understanding sufficiently the nature of what he was doing. It could not, at all events, have been intended by the M.R. to have overruled his own very elaborate judgment in Toker v. Toker (81 Beav. 629), affirmed as that decision was by the C. A. (3 De G. J. & S. 487. See supra, col. 3221). The true rule is that which is laid down by Turner, L.J. in Toker v. Toker.—p. 445.

Fletcher v. Bealey (1885) 28 Ch. D. 688; 54 L. J. Ch. 121; 52 L. T. 541; 33 W. R. 745.

PEARSON, J.—The first case I will mention is Ripon (Earl) v. Hobart. In that case the parliamentary commissioners for cleansing and improving the river Witham and its navigation, and the drainage of the adjacent lands, asked for an injunction against the defendants, who were the trustees for draining another district, and who were commencing to erect a steam-engine for pumping water from the fens into the river Witham, substituting a steam-engine for the power which they had previously obtained by windmills, which had up to that time been used for the purpose. It was said that the steam-engine intended to be employed would be equivalent in power to twenty-seven windmills, and that the effect of using a steam-engine of that power would be to pump so much water into the navigation as to overpower it altogether. Lord Brougham, L.C. said: "If, indeed, this be a work which not only gives the power of doing mischief, but cannot be used, or can hardly be in the common course of things be used without working mischief; if, in short, it be a thing which can scarcely be used without being abused, the case comes to be very different. For, in matters of this description, the law cannot make over-nice distinctions, and refuse the relief merely because there is a bare possibility that the evil may be avoided. Proceeding upon practical views of human affairs, the law will guard against risks which are so imminent that no prudent person can incur them, although they do not amount to absolute certainty of damage. Nay, it will go farther, according to the same practical and rational view, and, balancing the magnitude of the evil against the chances of its occurrence, it will even provide against a somewhat less imminent probability in cases where the mischief, should it be done, would be vast and overwhelming. Accordingly, if it appeared that the works in question could hardly be used without damage to the inferior districts, I might hold that erecting them was, in itself, a beginning of injury, though there might be a possibility of otherwise using them: and, if the damage, should it happen at all, were the destruction of the navigation, and the subjecting of the lower districts to a deluge, I might scrutinise less narrowly the probability of the engines being injuriously worked."—p. 696.

MALINS, V.-C.—In this case the rule in Shelley's Case applies, as all the limitations are equitable. I am not aware that there is any difference whatever in the application of the rule in Shelley's Case to a deed and to a will. It is stated in the report of Cooper v. Kynoch that the construction might have been otherwise in a will, but this statement has reference to the estate in fee taken by the trustees, and not to the application of the rule in Shelley's Case.—p. 202.

BACON, V.-C.—It is said there is no instance in which the same rule [that in Shelley's Case] has been applied to personal estate. De Beauvoir v. De Beauvoir (3 H. L. Cas. 524, see "WILL") and Gittings v. McDermott (2 Myl. & K. 69, see "WILL") are instances; and there are hundreds of other instances in which the same rule has been applied in the same manner to personal estate. But it is said there was a case of Herrick v. Franklin, before the late Giffard, L.J., when V.-C., in which a contrary decision was come to. No one can hear the name of Giffard, L.J., mentioned without feeling the utmost respect for any decision of his. No one can doubt his profound knowledge of the law; but I do not think he has decided anything of the kind. The question arising there between real estate and personal estate, the personal estate being given for life clogged with and bound by a trust to apply a portion of it to the maintenance of a lunatic brother—the V.-C. in effect said:—"It is not the time for me to decide that matter. I will not decide that, because these two things are blended together, these legacies are not at liberty to sell and dispose of the estate which is burdened with this trust. Hereafter when the time comes there may be a question between the persons who lay claim to the bequest, whether it goes to the next of kin or not."—p. 157.

Bowen v. Lewis (1884) 9 App. Cas. 850; 54 L. J. Q. B. 55; 52 L. T. 189.—H.L. (E.). EARL CAIRNS, LORDS BLACKBURN and FITZGERALD; SELBORNE, L.C. and LORD BRAMWELL dissenting. SELBORNE, L.C.—The rule in Shelley's Case ought not, in my opinion, to be extended, so as to defeat unnecessarily the expressed intention, by straining the interpretation of such words as "child or children," when they are capable of being understood in their usual and primary sense.—p. 898.

EARL CAIRNS.—I am bound to say that in my opinion the rule in Shelley's Case is not only not a technical rule, but it is the very opposite of a technical rule. . . . The foundation of the rule in Shelley's Case, as I understand it, is this: You have an indication of a general intention, which you gather from the whole of the will, that the estate shall travel through the issue generally of a certain person. You have that accompanied, no doubt, with a particular intention that the first taker shall take an estate for life; but in order to give effect not to a technical construction, which would limit the first taker to a life estate, but to give effect to the general intention of the testator, and to make the estate travel through the issue generally, as the testator intended it to do, you apply the rule in Shelley's Case. Otherwise, if you do not do that, the consequence is that the only other resource which you have is to give to the first taker in the series of issue an estate by purchase, in which case it will not go through the issue generally, but only through the descendants of that particular head of the issue.—p. 907.

FRY, L.J.—From the earliest times the Courts have always leant against any device to render an estate inalienable. It is the policy of the law always to make estates alienable, and it is immaterial by what device it is attempted to prevent an owner from exercising the power of ownership. This lies at the foundation of the rule in Shelley's Case, in which words appearing to convey an independent gift were construed to be words of limitation.—p. 184.

JESSEL, M.R.—I shall not say much about the rule in Shelley's Case. I have heard some judges say that, in their opinion, it was the most unjust decision that ever was come to. I shall not give that as my view; but it is a decision which I never could understand how anybody could come to. That, however, has nothing to do with the question before us. The doctrine has been a rule of law for too many hundred years, I suppose, for anybody to interfere with it. The question is, whether that rule applies to this case. If this case is within the rule we must apply it. There is a well-known doctrine about that rule, namely, that where the two estates, which otherwise would be joined together, as it were, by reason of the rule, are, the one of them legal, the other equitable, they cannot be joined, and the rule does not apply: the estates must be both equitable, or both legal. And the question as to this will is whether the two estates, which the defendants desire to join by virtue of the rule in Shelley's Case, are both equitable or are both legal: if they are, the rule applies; if the one is legal and the other equitable, it does not apply.—p. 103.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—The subject, which was discussed at the bar, so rarely comes up for discussion nowadays that I make no apology for reminding your lordships of the terms in which the rule [in Shelley's Case] was stated in the case from which it takes its name. The statement is this: "It is a rule in law, when the ancestor by any gift or conveyance takes an estate of freehold, and in the same gift or conveyance an estate is limited either mediately or immediately to his heirs in fee or in tail, that always in such cases 'the heirs' are words of limitation of the estate, and not words of purchase." Every part of that statement is, I think, deserving of attention, from the opening words, which declare the rule to be a "rule of law," to the last clause, which says that heirs can never take by purchase in a case to which the rule applies. It is hardly necessary to observe that any expression which imports the whole succession of inheritable blood has the same effect in bringing the rule into operation as the word "heirs," though perhaps it was not always so, and though it seems to have been thought at one time, and, indeed, it was argued as late as 1844, that, in the absence of technical words, the governing principle was not the rule in Shelley's Case, but the doctrine of cy-près—see 1 Rep. 106 b, n. 1. 5, and Harrison v. Harrison.—p. 751. See address at length. And see post, col. 3246.

BIGHAM, J.—The plaintiffs further contend that, if the grandchild is to be held as taking the reversion of the fee he does so not as purchaser, but as heir, because they say that the rule in Shelley's Case applies and vests this reversion in Mary, to whom by the same will an estate tail is given. The answer, however, to this contention is twofold. First, the devise is, in my opinion, an executory devise and not a remainder, because it was to take effect during the continuance of the estate tail; and, secondly, the beneficiaries under the devise were not the heirs of the body at large, but designated individuals of that class. Either of these circumstances is sufficient to prevent the operation of the rule in Shelley's Case.—p. 235.

WOOD, V.-C.—I have simply a limitation to the ancestor and others for their lives expressly. . . . There are no words of limitation added to the gift to the next heir, and the intention of the will is reduced to this, that it is simply a gift to the next heir for ever. It only comes to that; and it seems to me that the case is to be considered as concluded in substance by the words which I shall read from a very valuable judgment of Eyre, C.J., which is reported in Ambler at great length. The case is Dubber v. Trollope (Amb. 453, 456, post, col. 3236) . . . It is a very valuable report, because the corrections made in Mr. Blunt's edition are from Mr. Sargeant Hill's manuscript, and the judgment is given very fully. [His lordship then read part of the judgment, and continued:] Now comes the case which seems to me to be conclusive of this case. He [i.e., Eyre, C.J.] says, "Another case is in Styles 249; 1 Rolle's Abr. 627; Bawsey (or Pawsey) v. Lowdall . . . And this is not like to Archer's Case (supra), where the devise was to one for life, and after to his heir male, and the heirs male of such heir male; for there the inheritance is limited to the heirs of the body of such heir male; which shows, that the words 'for ever' were not made use of as a reason to help out the words 'heirs male' in the singular number, which was offered as an answer to these last cases." This is not very clearly expressed, but what I understand it to mean is this, that it is not enough to have the words "for ever," although these words would be sufficient to create a fee. . . . I quite agree with what fell from Kindersley, V.-C., in Greaves v. Simpson, that the decision in Archer's Case, did not rest upon the ground that by the superadded words of limitation the heir took a different kind of estate from that which but for those words his ancestor would have taken under the rule in Shelley's Case. The principle, I think, is that, although the difficulty remains of it being a contingent remainder we see such a clear intention on the part of the testator as takes it out of the range of Shelley's Case. . . . Now it does seem to me that both upon the reasoning and upon the cases there stated, the Lord Chief Justice came to the conclusion that you could not except a limitation of the rule in Shelley's Case, simply because of his using the words "for ever."—pp. 775–6.

LINDLEY, L.J.—It is to be observed that the limitation being in a deed executed in 1854, if the words "heirs and assigns" had not been added, the person or persons who would have taken the property would have taken as purchasers, but for life only, or they would have taken for life only, and therefore as purchasers. This was decided in Chambers v. Taylor (supra), and this decision goes far to show that the expression "person or persons who shall be his heir or heirs" is not equivalent to "his heir or heirs," and is not used to denote a class of persons who can be correctly described as his heirs generally. . . . The power of appointment does not exclude the application of the rule in Shelley's Case (ante, col. 3226): see, inter alia, Richardson v. Harrison (post, col. 3235). The expression "such heir as should be living at the death" occurred in Richards v. Bergavenny (Lady) (supra), and "heir for ever" in Fuller v. Chamier (supra, col. 3232) which was the case of a will. The words "heir or heirs, and the heirs of such heir or heirs," occurred in Bony v. Taylor: but the other words are different, and the difference is very material. The expression "heirs of the body, and his, her, and their heirs and assigns as tenants in common," occurred in Mills v. Seward. In all of these the rule in Shelley's Case was held to apply, and they come very near the present case. On the other hand, there are cases, also very like them and like this, where the rule in Shelley's Case has been held not to apply; but in all of those the limitation was to heir in the singular; and this case is not quite covered by any other decision which I have been able to discover, aided by counsel on both sides. In Archer's Case (supra, col. 3232), the limitation was to the next heir male and the heirs male of his body. In Greaves v. Simpson (supra, col. 3232), real and personal property were given in trust for A. for life, and after his death in trust for his heir or heiress, his or her heirs and assigns for ever. Similar observations apply to Willis v. Hiscox (col. 3233), and to Chamberlayne v. Chamberlayne (col. 3233), which were referred to in the argument. These come as near the present case as any in the other class. . . . The rule in Shelley's Case has been said to give effect to the general, as distinguished from the particular intention of settlors and testators: see per Earl Cairns in Bowen v. Lewis (9 App. Cas. 890, 907, ante, col. 3229); but the rule has the demerit of sacrificing in almost every case an intention which is clear and unmistakable, to an intention which is by no means clear, and which is rather attributed to than expressed by the settlor or testator: see per Lord Bramwell (9 App. Cas. 921). But unsatisfactory as the rule is if attempted to be defended upon the ground that it gives effect to a settlor's or testator's intentions, it must not be forgotten that the rule produces a very beneficial practical effect by rendering property more marketable than it otherwise would be. The rule may be justified and approved on this ground, as was pointed out by Fry, L.J., in Perry and Duggs, In re (col. 3235). Had it not been for the good practical results of the rule, the Courts would probably have struggled to escape from it rather than have consistently upheld it whenever it has been technically correct to do so. No one can study the mass of decisions on this subject without being struck with the extent to which the rule in Shelley's Case has been carried, and with the comparatively few cases to which the doctrine laid down in Archer's Case has been held applicable. This is the more remarkable as the rule in Archer's Case gives effect to, while the rule in Shelley's Case almost always defeats, the particular intention of the settlor or testator. However, I have found no case in which the doctrine in Archer's Case has been applied to a limitation to heirs in the plural; but in this case, although the expression "heir or heirs" occurs, that expression is used in the sense of heir in the singular, as I have already pointed out. The conclusion at which I have arrived is in accordance with the passages cited from Mr. Butler's note in Coke upon Littleton (377 a.) from Mr. Peare's celebrated book (10th ed. vol. i. pp. 188, 189), and from Hayes' Conveyancing (5th ed. vol. i. p. 543). It is quite clear that these great conveyancers (and Mr. Hargrave, who is quoted by Butler) were of opinion that a limitation in the form adopted in this deed would suffice to give Owen Evans' heir or heirs an estate in fee by purchase, and this deed has, I have no doubt, been framed as it is on the faith of the correctness of their opinion. I am glad to think that in upholding it I am not running counter to, but am, on the contrary, deciding in conformity with the opinion of such eminent men.—pp. 184–187.

(for the Court).—It was urged that the gift of an estate for life to T. Pedder, followed by a gift to his heir constitutes an estate in fee simple in T. Pedder under the rule in Shelley's Case (ante, col. 3226). But in our opinion this argument cannot prevail, for it appears to us to be clear law that where the limitation shows the testator's intent to have been that the heir shall take for life only, then the word "heir" is not to be treated as a word of limitation, and the rule does not apply. This point was determined in White v. Collins. . . In Jordan v. Adams (supra) the authority of White v. Collins was fully recognised, though there was a difference of opinion as to how far that decision affected the case then before the Court.—p. 572.

ALVERSTONE, C.J.—Then with regard to Roe v. Grew, I wish again to say that I do not suggest that it is an authority conclusive of this case; but it does again seem to be a case in which the Court, looking at the whole will, came to the conclusion that there was an estate tail, for reasons which I in my judgment think to be applicable, if I may use no stronger expression, to the present will. The Court there thought that of two intentions of the testator—one to give his nephew (George) a life estate, and the other that so long as George had any issue male the estate should not go over, the estate being limited after George's death to the issue male of his body lawfully to be begotten, and heirs male of the body of such issue male—both could not take effect; and the Court came to the conclusion that the words as to issue male were so strong that they showed the general intention to be that all the sons of George should take in succession, and that to enable them to take George must be adjudged to take an estate tail, and that therefore they must override the particular words which would have indicated only a life estate in George.—p. 55.

FRY, L.J. (for the Court).—"Common sense will here tell us," says Blackstone, J., in his argument in Perrin v. Blake [Hargrave's Tracts, 505] "that when no estate of inheritance is devised to the heir male of the body, he cannot take by descent as heir." This observation of the learned judge is adopted by Carnie in his Contingent Remainders, vol. i. p. 153.—p. 572.

If I am told that, after all, that is a matter of opinion on which no certain judgment can be pronounced, I only take refuge in Lord Thurlow's maxim, that "the good sense of all these cases is to believe that, where persons have expressed themselves right, they knew what they meant" (*Jones v. CLEASBY, B. (in the Ex.).—It is not at all necessary, in the present case, to act upon the rule of carrying into effect the general intent to the extent that it has been acted upon in such cases, as Doe v. Applin and Doe v. Cooper (1 East 229. post), where a particular provision clearly expressed has been rejected. The utmost extent to which, if at all, it need be applied is that modified form to which it is limited by Lord Redesdale in Jesson v. Wright (2 Bligh 51, post, col. 3243), and has been approved of by the Q. B. in Doe v. Gallini (5 B. & Ad. 621, post, col. 3242), viz., that technical words shall have their legal effect, unless from subsequent inconsistent words it is very clear that the testator meant otherwise.—p. 225.

MALINS, V.-C.—What then is the effect of a devise to A. and his heirs during their lives? It was decided in Doe v. Stenlake by the Court of K. B., and that decision had been acquiesced in ever since, that such a devise to A. and his heirs created a fee simple. . . . This is a limitation to a man and "the heirs male of his body for their lives." . . . Therefore this devise . . . gives an estate in tail male, and the words "during their lives" mean only that which is necessarily implied, that whoever takes under the limitation can only, in point of fact, have the enjoyment of it during his life; but it has not the effect of cutting down the estate of inheritance.—p. 662.

LORD BLACKBURN.—I do not think that, since the decision of this House in Roddy v. Fitzgerald (6 H. L. Cas. 823, post, col. 3247) it is open to dispute that a rule is established. Whether we word the reason for it, as Lord Eldon did in Jesson v. Wright (2 Bligh 1, post, col. 3243), or, as Lord Wensleydale prefers it, as it was expressed in Doe v. Gallini, the rule is established that if a testator does express an intention that A. shall have the estate for life, and on the failure of the heirs of the body of A. the estate shall go over, the effect is that an estate tail is given to A. by necessary implication, as otherwise all the subsequent limitations would be too remote. Lord Cranworth says, in Roddy v. Fitzgerald, that one cannot but feel that in many cases the real wish of the testator, instead of being carried into effect, is defeated by this rule, and I think this is true.—p. 917.

LORD FITZGERALD.—Lord Eldon is reported to have said in Jesson v. Wright that his mind was overpowered by the cases and the subtlety of the distinctions between them. How truly I may apply that language to myself in the present instance; but from an early stage of the argument I have been of opinion that the decision in the Courts below was correct, and should be upheld, and I am obliged to confess an almost superstitious veneration for the rule in Shelley's case (ante, col. 3226), and for *Jesson v. Montgomery v. Montgomery, observed on.

CHITTY, J.—The word "issue" is, prima facie, a word of limitation, which can be turned into a word of purchase more easily than the word "heir," but the mere addition of words of limitation is not sufficient to turn it into a word of purchase. Lord St. Leonards appears to have laid it down in Montgomery v. Montgomery that a devise to A. for life, with remainder to his issue, with superadded words of limitation, in a manner inconsistent with a descent from A., will give to the word "issue" the operation of a word of purchase. But it seems to me that that dictum has no application to the present case, and that the rule laid down in Jarman on Wills (4th ed. vol. ii. p. 419) is right—namely, that "the addition of a limitation to the heirs general of the issue will not prevent the word 'issue' from operating to give an estate tail as a word of limitation."—p. 118.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—The decision in Jesson v. Wright ((1820) 2 Bligh 1, supra, col. 3243) covers, I think, the whole field of the controversy. It makes it almost a work of supererogation to consult the earlier authorities. . . . For a time Jesson v. Wright was loyally followed. In Doe v. Harrey ((1825) 4 L. J. (O.S.) K. B. 18; 4 B. & C. 610, supra, col. 3242) the Court of K. B. acknowledged their error, and recalled their former decision. But very soon cases occurred, such as Right v. Creber ((1826) 4 L. J. (O.S.) K. B.; 5 B. & C. 806) in which proper effect does not seem to have been given to the authority of Jesson v. Wright. The most disappointing case of all, I think, is the Irish case of Montgomery v. Montgomery, before Sir Edward Sugden in 1845, on which Mr. Haldane so much relied. Everybody must acknowledge Sir E. Sugden's profound learning. He was himself one of the counsel for the appellant in Jesson v. Wright; but though successful in the appeal, he does not seem to have welcomed the short and simple grounds on which the decision was rested—see

Sugden on the Law of Real Property, 251, n. Perhaps the editor of Gilbert on Uses would have preferred that something should have been left of the old labyrinth through which he, at least, knew his way in the dark. His observations in Montgomery v. Montgomery, as he tells us, were made "with a view to clear up the doubts on this branch of the law." The result was unfortunate. No difficulties were cleared up; no doubtful points explained; and Montgomery v. Montgomery is never cited except when it is desired to minimise the effect of Jesson v. Wright, and it is always cited then. There is a good deal in the earlier part of the judgment which it is difficult to follow. In my opinion, it is not an accurate view of the decision of this House in Jesson v. Wright to say that it "only decided that the words 'heirs of the body' should operate as words of limitation where otherwise the issue could not take estates of inheritance." Except for the purpose of making that point good, I cannot understand why Sir E. Sugden should have suggested that Doe v. Giff ((1809) 11 East 668, supra, col. 3241) was not really overruled, and that "a similar case would be open to consideration." One of the two noble and learned lords who spoke in Jesson v. Wright condemned Doe v. Giff in plain and direct terms. The other said it was "difficult to reconcile" with the case before the House. Sir E. Sugden on this remarks that the Lord Chancellor did not say that it was impossible; he said it was difficult. But the language is Lord Eldon's, and, as was observed of another judge in another case, "it was a great deal for him to say." Over and over again in this House, Doe v. Giff has been treated as no longer law. In Fetherston v. Fetherston ((1835) 3 Cl. & F. 67, 76, supra, col. 3244), which, by the way, is not referred to in Montgomery v. Montgomery, Lord Brougham observed that it was "entirely displaced," and it is spoken of in the same way in Winter v. Perrott ((1843) 9 Cl. & F. 606, 686), and Roddy v. Fitzgerald ((1858) 6 H. L. Cas. 823, 879, post, col. 3247).—p. 753. . . . Lastly, I cannot think that the passages which Sir E. Sugden collected from the arguments of Blackstone, J., in Perrih v. Blake ((1770) 4 Burr. 2579, ante, col. 3238) and pieced together in his judgment in Montgomery v. Montgomery, convey an accurate representation of the meaning of that learned judge. Undoubtedly Blackstone, J. refers to the rule in Shelley's Case (ante, col. 3226) as a rule of a flexible nature. But he did not, I think, mean that the rule as we understand it, and as it was understood in Roddy v. Fitzgerald, was otherwise than imperative. You may have a gift of an estate of freehold to the ancestor, and in the same will a gift to the heirs, so that the case is within the letter of the rule, and yet the rule will not apply, because the legal meaning of the word "heirs" has to yield to an explanatory context—Paole v. Paole ((1804) 3 B. & P. 620, 624, supra, col. 3241). It seems to me that all that Blackstone, J. meant was what Lord Alvauley expressed when he said, "The rule is not so rigid as to preclude the testator himself from explaining the words used" (pp. 753-754). . . . The authority of Jesson v. Wright was restored, and its supremacy finally established, in Roddy v. Fitzgerald. And the question now in every case must be whether the expression requiring exposition, be it "heirs" or "heirs of the body," or any other expression which may have the like meaning, is used as the designation of a particular individual or a particular class of objects, or whether, on the other hand, it includes the whole line of succession capable of inheriting.—p. 755.

BUCKLEY, J.—The decision of the H. L. in Roddy v. Fitzgerald is another authority directly in point upon this part of the case. There was a gift over "in failure of issue," and the House held that in such a case it is presumed that "issue" means "heirs of the body." Here the gift over is "in failure of which"—that is, "in failure of such issue male and their male descendants." It is, I think, therefore to be presumed that the word "issue" has been used by the testator as meaning "heirs of the body," and it is for the parties seeking to give it another meaning to show clearly from the context of the will that the testator intended to give it a different meaning.—p. 878.

COTTON, L.J.—Then I have to consider this question, namely, whether the gift to Eliza Hayley's right heirs was the gift of an equitable or legal estate, the previous life-interest devised to her being only an equitable estate. That is on the principle that the rule in Shelley's Case (ante, col. 3226) can be applied only where the estate for life and the estate in remainder are of the same quality, that is, both legal or both equitable. I am of opinion that in the present case both the estates are equitable estates, and I will dispose at once of Hart's Estate, In re, Orford v. Hart, before Kay, J., as inapplicable to this. It is unnecessary to determine whether that case was rightly or wrongly decided, because in it there was nothing to show that the estate was to be in the trustees beyond the life-interest of the devisee, the testator's daughter, in whose favour a separate use was created. There were no directions to sell. The question generally is, whether in the will it is apparent that the testator intended the trustees to have the legal estate for any limited period or for all time.—p. 108.

CRANWORTH, L.C.—I think that the doctrine propounded and acted on in *Barratt v. White v. Morris (1852) 11 C. B. 1015; 21 L. J. C. P. 185; 16 Jur. 500.

JERVIS, C.J.—It is an established rule of law—never doubted until Bessey v. Windham—that the mere production of the writ, and nothing more, will not enable the sheriff to show that a deed, good as against all except creditors, is fraudulent and void. He must show that he represents a creditor. For this purpose the bare production of the writ is not enough. The writ merely authorises and directs the sheriff to do a certain act, and his endorsement or return thereon is a mere statement that he has done as he was directed. There is no statement that a judgment exists; but only that somebody says that a judgment has been obtained. I think that the production by the plaintiff of the writ in this case was not evidence for the defendants that a judgment existed. I am aware that, in coming to this conclusion, we cannot avoid conflicting with the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench in Bessey v. Windham, where it was held that the officer was protected by the warrant, although there was no evidence of the existence of any judgment.—p. 1028.

PATTESON, J.—It was held that the sheriff could not be made a trespasser by relation. All the reporters agree in stating that to be the point decided. Even Comberbach so states, although he makes Holt, J., say: "The property in goods is vested by the delivery of the fiery facias, and the extent afterwards for the king comes too late; and this by the Statute of Frauds and Perjuries." This must be a mistake. It is contrary to Lord Holt's own position in Smallcomb v. Cross (1 Ld. Raym. 252); it is wholly beside the question before him, and makes him consider the Statute of Frauds as binding on the king who is not named in it. Lord Mansfield, in Cooper v. Chitty (1 Burr. 36), says that Lord Holt could never say that the property in the goods vested by the delivery of the fiery facias, and that the extent for the king afterwards came too late; and adds:—"No inception of an execution can bar the Crown." And Lord Ellenborough also points out the inaccuracy of Comberbach very forcibly in 4 East 539 (Payne v. Drew).—p. 302.

PATTERSON, J.—Also in Smallcomb v. Buckingham, which is the same case as is elsewhere called *Smallcomb v. PATTERSON, J.—As to Wintle v. Chetwynd, what I am reported to have said there is not correct. The return, indeed, was bad; for the sheriff cannot show generally that he seized under two writs; he ought to show the amount due on the earlier writ, and the value of the goods seized. But if the report be correct (as I dare say it is), I was quite wrong in saying that it was impossible to seize under both writs. There may be many writs in the sheriff's hands at the time of seizure; and he seizes under all.—p. 548.

COCKBURN, C.J.—The fundamental rule that in actions of tort there must be a wrongful act and damage resulting from it applies here, unless the case is an exception on the ground that the sheriff is concluded from denying the statement in his return. We have, therefore, to see whether there is any authority for assuming this to be an exception to the general conditions which govern actions of this kind, and the authority relied upon is the dictum of Lord Campbell in Remmett v. Lawrence (infra). Now the dictum was clearly unnecessary to the decision, though it is no doubt entitled to the respect due to everything which fell from that distinguished judge. Still it is not an authority which is binding upon us, and in Levy v. Hale (infra) it was distinctly held that the sheriff is not estopped in an action for a false return from proving the real facts to show that the plaintiff has sustained no damage. It is true that in Mildmay v. Smith and Clark v. Withers, it appears to have been held that the sheriff was not at liberty to controvert the facts stated in his return. But on turning to Mildmay v. Smith, we find that it was a case where the sheriff had returned that the goods were rescued while they were in his hands. . . . And in Clark v. Withers, it is simply stated that the sheriff is answerable for the value of the goods after he has seized them, and is bound to the value he has returned them to be of. Both these cases arose upon scire facias.—p. 54.

PATTESON, J.—In *Yea v. That case, however, was overruled by Concanen v. Lethbridge (2 H. Bl. 36), in which it was held that the plaintiff might recover damages beyond the penalty of the bond, that is, for more than double the value of the goods distrained.—p. 561.

Hill v. Heale (1806) 2 Bos. & P. N. R. 196.
MANSFIELD, C.J.—The case in Burrow, which has been referred to, does not appear to me to apply to this, though the dictum which it contains does. The question there related to the form of the declaration. Denison, J., who was a pleader of the first eminence, observed, that in practice, the form of the declaration was sometimes one way and sometimes another, and that he did not think the averment necessary. This was the sole question before the Court. But I should have great difficulty in agreeing with the doctrine imputed to the Court of K. B., that the statute of 12 Geo. I. is merely directory. I cannot help entertaining great doubts respecting that dictum. The sheriff must see by the writ whether it be indorsed or not, and I cannot think he could justify an arrest without it. But this was merely a dictum and not necessary to the opinion of the Court.—p. 201.

The point there was, whether the sheriff could break the inner doors to search for a person not in the house.—p. 626.

[Held, per CROMPTON, MELLOR and SHEE, JJ., that the sheriff was justified in discharging the debtor on the production of the certificate, although the deed afterwards turned out to be invalid, and therefore was not liable to an action for escape. COCKBURN, C.J. dissented.]

COCKBURN, C.J.—As I have before observed, the question on this demurrer is, whether the sheriff was justified in taking upon himself to discharge the debtor, and returning that he was protected by the certificate from arrest. To this, for the reasons I have stated, there can, in my judgment, be but one answer; unless, indeed, we were prepared to overrule Dewhurst v. Kershaw, Ilderton v. Jewell, and *Leigh v. BOVILL, C.J.—The argument on the part of the plaintiff has proceeded upon the supposition that the Court had conclusively decided, in Ames v. Colnaghi, that the sheriff was bound of his own authority to discharge the debtor on the production of a certificate under the hand of the chief registrar, and the seal of the Court, of the filing and registration of a deed under sect. 192 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and that if he refuses to discharge him from custody on his producing such certificate, he is liable to an action for trespass. The argument, however, is founded on a misconception of what the Court really decided in that case. The question presented for decision was, whether under the circumstances the debtor was entitled to be discharged; and that question the Court answered in the affirmative. The mode of discharge which is directly raised on the present occasion did not come in question there.—p. 58.

WILLES, J., who concurred, discussed the earlier cases.

KEATING, J.—The learned counsel altogether misconceived the intention of this Court in Ames v. Colnaghi. The question submitted in that case was, whether or not the plaintiff was entitled to be discharged, and all the Court decided was, that he was so entitled. There are, no doubt, expressions to be found in the course of the judgment to the effect that the sheriff was bound to discharge him. But they are not to be construed as meaning that he must, at the peril of an action, discharge him. The Court would order his discharge and possibly the officer would be liable to the penalty imposed by sect. 113 of the Act of 1849.—p. 64. BRETT, J. concurred.

BRETT, J.—If the sheriff when he discharged the debtor knew facts which showed that the deed [made by the debtor under the Bankruptcy Acts] was not available, he is responsible [in an action for escape]. Williams v. Rose (supra) is strongly in point, as the replication alleged knowledge, and although Dignam v. Bailly by itself is perhaps not so strong, as the plaintiff did not allege knowledge, it is explained in Rossi v. Bailey (supra), where Blackburn, J. said there was no necessity to allege he knew because the certificate [of registration of the deed] and the ca. sa. [under which the debtor was arrested] necessarily show the facts, and therefore . . . where the facts are known to the sheriff, he is not authorised by the mere production of the certificate in releasing the debtor.—p. 216.

BAXLEY, J.—Morris v. Hayward (6 Taunt. 569; 2 Marsh. 280) is an authority to show, that although the sheriff is not bound to take bail upon an attachment, still if he does he may recover upon the bail bond. That indeed was the case of an attachment, out of chancery, but process issuing out of Courts of law and equity stands on the same foundation. That case was decided upon great consideration, and is at variance with the subsequent case of Phelps v. Barrett, the foundation of which was, that an attachment is a process in the nature of execution. But for the reasons I have already given it seems to me that an attachment is in the nature of mesne process, and that the principle on which that decision took place cannot be supported.—p. 63.

WRIGHT, J.—On the question whether an appeal lies [to the judge in bankruptcy] from the taxing master on a question as to the fees to which the sheriff is entitled, I do not think that Townend v. Yorkshire (Sheriff) is an authority that no appeal will lie, where the question is one—not as it there was, of amount—but as it is here, of principle. It seems to me to be entirely within Hurley, In re [1893; 10 Morrell 120] that an appeal does lie; and if it were necessary to decide the question, which it is not in the view I take of the matter, I should hold that I am bound by authority to say that it does lie; and also I should say for myself, that I think it lies.—p. 346.

BRAMWELL, L.J.—I do not wish to question

Nash v. Dickenson. That was a perfectly correct decision, because there was no seizure in that case. The sheriff there did not "levy," p. 218.

BRETT, L.J.—Alchin v. Wells is in point. The Court there say: "The sheriff who has levied is entitled to his poundage." It seems to me that Roe v. Robinson is to the same effect. Where the money has been obtained by the seizure, although there has been no sale, the sheriff has a right to his poundage. In Chapman v. Bowlby, both Abinger, C.B. and Parke, B. recognise the principle laid down in Alchin v. Wells, and hold that where, by the compulsion of the writ, the execution debtor has been forced to pay the debt, the sheriff is entitled to his poundage. The last case decided on the point was Bissicks v. Bath Colliery Co., before Cockburn, C.J., and Cleasby, B., who acted upon the rule laid down in the previous cases. There is not one decision to the contrary, except Roe v. Hammond and the case under consideration.—p. 220. COTTON, L.J. concurred.

LINDLEY, L.J.—But eliminating those classes of cases—and we have nothing to do with them here—the trustee in bankruptcy is in no better position than the bankrupt himself. The consequence of that is that the trustee in this bankruptcy is not in a position to say that this possession money [claimed by the sheriff, who at the request of the debtor and with the assent of the execution creditor had remained in possession for some time without selling] is not as against him what it would be as against the bankrupt—namely, costs of execution. That is the short answer which I give to this case. That is the view, as I understand it, on which Hurley, In re, proceeded.—pp. 347, 348.

STIRLING, J.—Since 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, it has been held in Carter v. Hughes that where a judgment creditor issued three writs of elegit on successive judgments, and the sheriff delivered to him possession of land under the first writ, he had no power to extend the same land under the second and third writs. In the present case the inquiry found that Mrs. Cole was "possessed" of certain land of the annual value of £200. In fact, she was so possessed; for though she had made a mortgage of the lands by sub-demise, the mortgagees had not taken possession, and she was in receipt of the rents and profits. . . . It appears to me that the land must be taken to have been delivered to the defendant to the extent of that interest, and not of the mere reversion expectant on the determination of the sub-demise.

Jones (infra, col. 3268), that a request by the solicitor that a particular bailiff might be employed to execute the writ was evidence of a contract by him to pay that bailiff's fees and possession money; and in one of those cases (Foster v. Blakelock, supra) the distinction was expressly pointed out by Bayley, J., between such a state of circumstances and that which exists where the solicitor merely delivers the writ for execution to the sheriff. Maybery v. Mansfield, and Seal v. Hudson (infra) were cases in which there was in fact nothing more than the delivery of the writ to the sheriff, and in both those cases, it was held that there was no evidence of any contract, and that the solicitor was not liable. In Brewer v. Jones, the Court of exchequer arrived at an opposite conclusion, upon the authority (as it considered) of Walbank v. Quarterman (infra), and it is remarkable that the judges who pronounced that decision themselves regarded it as at variance with sound principle, and only justified it by that (supposed) precedent. Walbank v. Quarterman, however, was decided upon the authority of Foster v. Blakelock, in which the distinction already noticed was pointed out, and it was determined, upon a state of facts similar to that which existed in Foster v. Blakelock. It is therefore no precedent at all for Brewer v. Jones, which thus stands self-condemned as against sound principle, and is opposed to the judgment of a Court of co-ordinate jurisdiction, and of equal authority in Maybery v. Mansfield. We have no hesitation in following Maybery v. Mansfield in preference to Brewer v. Jones.—p. 174. BAGGALLAY and BOWEN, L.JJ. concurred.

LINDLEY, RIGBY and VAUGHAN WILLIAMS,
L.JJ.

LINDLEY, L.J.—It [the General Order of Aug. 31, 1888, under the Sheriff's Act, 1887] further provides that where an execution is withdrawn, or stopped, the fees under the Order shall be paid by the person issuing the execution or the person at whose instance the sale is stopped. As regards these last words, I think counsel for the appellant was right, having regard to the decision in Woolford (Trustee of)
v. Levy. The trustee in bankruptcy or the official receiver did stop the sale, but that does not carry him through. His contention amounts to this—that all the fees under the Order shall in such a case be paid, whether earned or not;
but of course the Order does not mean that.
The only sensible construction is that such fees shall be paid as have been earned up to the time of the stoppage of the execution, and the poundage has not been earned. There is nothing to give the sheriff more than he got as the costs of the execution under the former Act.—p. 248.

DENMAN, J. (for the Court).—In support of this contention several cases were cited—especially Clarke v. Spence (supra), Woods v. Russell (supra) and Wood v. Bell. But, in truth, none of those cases afford material assistance towards the decision of the present case. They were all cases, not of a contract for work and materials to be supplied to a ship by way of repairs or alterations, but contracts for building and supplying a ship; and the question which arose in all those cases was, whether the ship itself or the materials ready to be fitted to it had or had not passed to the purchaser at the time of the bankruptcy of the builder.—p. 137.

SIR BARNES PEACOCK (for the Court).—So strictly were the provisions of the earlier statutes relating to the transfer of British ships interpreted that it was held by Lord Eldon that the doctrine of implied trust in a Court of equity could not be extended to the case of a British registered ship where the title accrued by an act of the parties other than a transfer made in accordance with the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts. See Yallop, Ex parte (supra) and Curtis v. Perry (supra). His lordship, however, drew a clear distinction [in the above cases] between such a case and a trust implied by law not arising out of an act in which the parties claiming the beneficial interest had joined.—p. 40.

WIGRAM, V.-C.—In that case [Helme v. Smith] it was decided that the managing owner may sue each shareholder for his proportion of the expenses before the adventure ends, which it was said in an ordinary partnership he could not do; and other cases to the same effect were cited. But there is no reason why this right should preclude the party who made an advance for his co-partner for joint purposes, from insisting, when the joint property comes to be divided, that in making the division each partner, before he receives his proportion of profits, shall be charged with his due proportion of the expenses of making them. The observations of Bosanquet, J., in Helme v. Smith, apply in some degree to that view of the case.—p. 326.

JESSEL, M.R.—There was a question there [i.e., in Sharp v. Taylor] as to whether certain sums of money earned contrary to the English Navigation Laws could be kept by the defendant. [His lordship then quoted the observations of Lord Cottenham on the point, and continued:] I must say, speaking with some hesitation, as I always do of any judgment of Lord Cottenham's, that that reasoning, to my mind, is inconclusive and unsatisfactory. The notion that because a transaction is closed a Court of equity is to interfere in dividing the proceeds of the illegal transaction is not only opposed to principle, but to authority, and to authority in the well-known case of the highwayman who sued for a division of the proceeds of the robbery. There, of course, it might have been answered that the transaction was complete; and so also in the case he puts of one of two partners engaged in trade—as I read it, he meant smuggling goods. If two persons go partners as smugglers, can one maintain a bill against the other to have an account of the smuggling transaction? I should say certainly not. It is not sufficient to say that the transaction is concluded. It would be lending the aid of the Court to assert the rights of the parties in carrying out and completing an illegal contract. . . . I do not say that that at all affects the authority of Sharp v. Taylor as it stands, but I think it does affect very much the dicta which I have read, and that is the reason I have read it. It is no part of the duty of a Court of Justice to aid either in carrying out an illegal contract, or in dividing the proceeds arising from an illegal contract between the parties to that illegal contract. In my opinion, no action can be maintained for the one purpose more than for the other.—p. 533.

WILLES, J.—The plaintiffs claimed to have the bark delivered to them on payment of the freight stipulated for by the bills of lading, viz., 3*l.* per ton nett weight delivered. Mackenzie, acting for the owners of the ship, declined to deliver it, except on payment of the freight upon the quantity mentioned in the bill of lading; and in order to obtain the bark, the plaintiffs were obliged to yield to his demand. They are clearly entitled to recover back the excess. It is a mistake to apply Sims v. Brittain and Sims v. Bond to cases of this kind, because money had and received is only a short form which the plaintiffs are entitled to adopt instead of suing for conversion.

BRAMWELL, B. (for the Court).—The case, then, must rest, not on principle, but on authority, and that authority is limited to a passage in Story on Agency. It is remarkable that he is of opinion that there was, by the Roman law, an option to sue either, but not both. If so, what he lays down is peculiar to "our law," and doubly anomalous. He gives no reason for it, but cites 2 Livermore on Agency, 267. He (Story) says the second action may be maintained unless "in the first action he has obtained complete satisfaction of his claim." On reference, however, to Livermore, we say it with respect, he really says nothing in support of such a proposition. What he says is:—"Masters of merchant vessels are personally answerable upon the contracts made by them in relation to the employment of the ship, to repairs, or to supplies furnished for the ship's use. For the law gives to the merchant who contracts with the master a twofold remedy against the owner and against the master." For this he cites Rich v. Coe, which, though a very questionable decision, justifies Livermore's propositions but not Story's. It only decides that the owners are liable upon an order by the master for necessities, though without their authority. It is true Lord Mansfield says the master, the owner, and the ship are trusted, but he says nothing to support what is contended for. It is remarkable Story does not cite this authority so cited by Livermore. Melius est petere fontes quam sectari rivulos.—p. 985.

BRETT, J.—Accordingly if it be found that the owner is present at the port and has the means or credit to obtain supplies, I think it is the law of England that the judge should direct the jury that there is no necessity for any authority on the part of the captain, and the jury would not be justified in finding that there was any such necessity. The same principle applies even when the owner is not present, if he has either in a port or in his own or a foreign country constituted an agent to stand in his place, and intrusted such agent with his discretion to act in the management of the ship, and such agent has undertaken and has the necessary means or credit to do so. In such case the agent represents the owner, and the captain as servant of the owner is bound to act under his directions, and has no authority to act for himself in the matter. This view of the law appears to be supported by all the authorities. The leading case on the subject is Arthur v. Barton, and the opinion there expressed by Lord Abinger as a summary of all the previous authorities, has always been held as a correct expression of the law. That opinion has always been quoted with approbation ever since; it has never to my knowledge been questioned, and has been copied into all the text books, as, for example, Abbott on Shipping, 11th ed., p. 114; Smith's Mercantile Law, 7th ed., p. 128, and MacLachlan on Merchant Shipping, p. 131.—p. 336.

MARTIN, B.—I thought the authorities went further than they really do, with the exception of Robinson v. Lyall. On consideration, I am of the same opinion as my brother Parke. The true principle is, that the master has not authority to borrow money after the work has been done for the purpose of paying the debt due for it. I think that is a sound and safe principle, and my impression is, that the principle laid down by Holroyd, J., in the case of Robinson v. Lyall, and afterwards adopted by the Court, is not true law.—p. 891.

GROVE, J.—The case that seemed most in favour of the appellant's contention was Frazer v. Marsh. There it was held that the registered owner of a ship, having chartered her to the then captain at a rent for a certain number of voyages, is not liable for stores furnished to the ship by order of the charterer during the charter-party. But there was there an absolute demise and parting with the vessel; nor was the registration there of the same kind as the registration of the managing owner under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1875, which has for its object that there shall be someone responsible for the seaworthiness and proper management of the vessel. There are, therefore, two distinctions between Frazer v. Marsh and the present case.

SIR R. PHILLIMORE.—The principle upon which Brown v. Mallett . . . was decided, clearly applies only to cases in which a vessel has been abandoned or ceased to be under the control or management of her owner or his servants. In the present case . . . I am of opinion that the defendants cannot contest their liability upon the suggestion that The Industrie had passed out of their control, without pleading facts to support that defence.—p. 28.

COLLIERIDGE, C.J.—I do not think Brown v. Mallett and *White v. Those cases may stand with this, for in Brown v. Mallett the declaration did not show the owner of the barge to be in possession at the time of the collision; and in White v. Crisp (infra) the defendants had the control of the wreck.—p. 90.

HERSCHELL, L.C.—It was argued that the master of a vessel, although in some respects the servant of the shipowner, possesses in relation to the crew powers and duties independent of him, and that the law which exempts a master from liability to his servant for the negligence of another servant engaged in a common employment with him did not apply in such a case. The only authority cited for this proposition was a case of Ramsay v. Quinn, in the Court of Common Pleas, Ireland. But in view of the judgment of this House in Wilson v. Merry [L. R. 1 H. L. (Sc.) 326], which was recently considered in Johnson v. Lindsay [61 L. J. Q. B. 90], I do not think it is possible to give effect to the contention of the appellant.—p. 421. COCKBURN, C.J.—The next case in point of date, and it is the first case in the books in which the liability of the owners of a sea-going ship comes in question, is the well-known case of Morse v. Slew, in which it was held, after a trial at bar, that where a ship lying in the Thames was boarded by robbers who took the plaintiff's goods, which had been loaded on board, in an action brought against the master, the plaintiff was entitled to recover. And it certainly surprises me that this case should be relied on as an authority for the position that the liability of a common carrier attaches to the shipowner or master where the ship is not a general ship. For though it is not expressly said that the ship in question was a general ship, which has led to the somewhat hasty assumption that she was not, the internal evidence shows conclusively that she was so. [His lordship then stated the various grounds for that view.] There seems, therefore, no reasonable doubt that the ship was a general ship.—p. 703.

BUTT, J. (for the Court; after discussing sects. 187 and 191 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, continued).—We think, therefore, that the extra payment is not made part of the seamen's wages by sect. 187. Even were it otherwise—were the extra payment made part of the seamen's wages—it would by no means follow that sect. 191 makes a similar extra payment part of a master's wages. By the words of sect. 191 a master is to have, not the same right to wages as the seaman, but only the same rights, liens, and remedies for the recovery of his wages. It does not purport to give the master any additional wages, but only the same rights, liens, and remedies for the recovery of his wages as the seaman has for the recovery of his.

JEUNE, P.—The question, then, is, does the plaintiff bring himself within the Admiralty Court Act, 1861? By sect. 10 the claim must be "by a seaman of any ship for wages earned by him on board the ship." . . . In the case of The Chieftain, Dr. Lushington, when dealing with the case of a captain who was employed a great deal on shore, looked at the nature of his duties, and held that he was entitled to a lien for wages. But having regard to the character of the duties of the plaintiff in this case [a ship's husband], I do not think that they are duties of the nature of those of a seaman even in the extended sense to be given to the term.

LORD WATSON.—In The Mary Ann, which was decided by Dr. Lushington in 1865, that learned judge held that the master's claim for disbursements on account of ship does bear a proper maritime lien. In arriving at that result, I do not think the learned judge relied solely upon the provisions of the [Admiralty Court] Act of 1861, although there are observations in his judgment which might admit of that construction. His reasoning leads me to infer that, if before the passing of the Act, claims for disbursements had been wholly excluded from the jurisdiction of his Court, and had been unaccompanied by a lien, Dr. Lushington would have held that the provisions of the Act were, per se, insufficient to create the right. . . . The real grounds of Dr. Lushington's decision in The

Mary Ann are to be found in the fact that, before the Act of 1861 his Court had a limited jurisdiction over claims for disbursements and in the assumption that, in such cases, the master had a maritime lien. Upon these premises the learned judge argues, with considerable force, that it must have been the intention of the legislature that under the enlarged jurisdiction conferred by sect. 10 of the later Act [of 1861] the master's claim for disbursements should have the same privileges which were attached to it under the limited jurisdiction established by the [Merchant Shipping] Act of 1854. . . . In my opinion the ratio of the judgment in The Mary Ann fails; because I am unable to hold that the enactments of sect. 191 of the Merchant Shipping Act can be interpreted as creating a maritime lien for disbursements; and the enactments of the statute of 1861, even when tested by Dr. Lushington's own principles, are in themselves insufficient to create such a right. In The Feronia (infra) the authority of The Mary Ann was followed by Sir Robert Phillimore, who refers to and admits the views of his predecessor. It was again followed in the case of The Ringdove (post, col. 3285) by Sir James Hannen, who stated that the reasoning of Dr. Lushington was not satisfactory to his mind. . . . It was strongly urged by the respondent's counsel that your lordships are now precluded by a series rerum judicatarum, from denying effect to the principle laid down in The Mary Ann and The Feronia. But I do not think that these authorities, which have been followed but not approved in the most recent cases, are of sufficient weight to establish a latent security of an exceptional character against purchasers and mortgagees.—p. 218.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—The question whether the decision in The Mary Ann, and the practice of the Admiralty Court, which rests upon it can be supported, depends, I think, on the answer to be given to one or both of these further questions: (1) whether the decision in The Glentanner (supra, col. 3282) was right? and if so, (2) whether the existence of the rule laid down justified Dr. Lushington's inference as to the intention and effect of the Act of 1861. It is not, I think, necessary to go into the latter question, because I am of opinion that the decision of The Glentanner was based on a construction of the Act of 1854 which is plainly erroneous.—p. 225.

HANNEN, P.—It was argued that the master had an implied authority to pledge the owner's credit as their agent ex necessitate in order to enable the ship to sail; and I was referred to The Beeswing as an authority for this contention. But the authority of the master depends on the facts, and as the charterers were bound to pay for the hire of the vessel during its detention, the owners had no interest in obtaining its immediate departure. Even if it had not been so, the plaintiff should have communicated by telegram with his owners before pledging their credit for disbursements, which he knew they were not bound to make.—p. 24.

GORELL BARNES, J.—The case is distinguishable from that of The Orienta. . . In the former (The Orienta) the master did not properly incur liabilities on account of the ship in the ordinary course of his employment; whereas in the present case he obtained the coals in the ordinary course of his employment as master of the vessel, and by so doing pledged the credit of Niel, McLean & Co. [who had been allowed by the defendants, the real owners, to have the control of the vessel] for them, and rendered himself liable on the bills drawn by him. . . The last and most difficult question raised by the second point has to be considered—namely, whether the master acquired a maritime lien which can be enforced by him against a vessel legally owned by the defendants and not by Neil, McLean & Co. The proposition maintained by defendants' counsel was that a maritime lien can only arise and be enforced against a vessel owned by persons who are personally liable to the party seeking to enforce the lien. . . The case principally relied on by the defendants was The Castlegate. . . The point now raised was not before the House [of Lords in that case], and the real decision was . . . that a master who, with knowledge of a charter-party under which the charterers are to provide and pay for coals, orders coals on their credit and draws on them for the value, and had, and knew that he had no authority, express or implied, to pledge the owner's credit for the coals, has not a maritime lien for the amount of his liability on the bills drawn for the price of the coals. . . it is thus apparent that the decision in the Castlegate does not govern the present case.—pp. 114, 116 and 117.

PHILLIMORE, J. (for the Court).—We do not, however, decide this case upon the ground that no sections in Part II. of the [Merchant Shipping] Act of 1894, apply to foreign ships. We agree with Darling and Channell, JJ., in Reg. v. Stewart, that there may be acts done in relation to foreign ships which, when done by English subjects in England, come as much under the penal provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, as if they were done in relation to English ships. We think that the case they had to deal with was one of such cases. We ground our decision upon the fact that this part of the Act (Part II.) contains a special provision for the case of desertion from foreign ships, and has thus shown that its general provisions are limited to desertion from British ships.

CLEASBY, B.—Button v. Thompson merely decided upon a particular contract, that a servant was entitled to wages earned during the month before that in which he absented himself. It is no authority that he would have been entitled to his current wages. Here the plaintiff was engaged by the week, and having left his service during a week, he could have no claim for the wages he would have earned at the end of it.

GROVE, J.—There are no decisions actually on the section itself, but the case of The Liverpool Borough Bank v. Turner, a decision on sect. 66 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, was decided by two distinguished judges, Lord Hatherley (then V.-C. Wood) and Lord Campbell, on the ground that the words in the sixty-sixth section relating to mortgages were not inconsistent with the provisions of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 89, which had been decided, as I think, on good grounds, to mean that any passing of property should be void unless accompanied by the formalities enjoined by that Act, and that the reasoning under the earlier statute could be imported into the discussion as to the meaning of the section in question. Now, if I were deciding a question on the sixth-sixth section, I should be bound by that decision, whatever my own opinion might happen to be. But then two reasons are alleged why this decision is not binding on me. One is, that the decision was on the sixty-sixth section, relating to mortgages, and not on the fifty-fifth section relating to transfers of ships. This sixty-sixth section enacts that a "ship, or any share therein, may be made a security for a loan or other valuable consideration, and the instrument creating such security, hereinafter termed a mortgage," shall be in a specified form. And the decision thereon was, that a registered British ship could not be made security for a loan except by mortgage which required registration. Though it is said that there is a considerable difference between this section and the fifty-fifth, yet I cannot help feeling much influenced by the expressions used by V.-C. Wood, who put the two cases of mortgage and transfer on the same footing, which, to a less extent, Lord Campbell also did. But I am not bound by these, which are only obiter dicta, and if I can find any substantial distinction I am bound to use my own judgment, and I am of opinion that there is such a distinction to be drawn which leads me to feel not bound by the obiter dicta of the judges in that case. The words in the fifty-fifth section, "shall be transferred," are, without doubt, restricted in their meaning to a sale; whereas the word "security" must ex vi termini mean equitable or legal agreements. In the sixty-sixth section it seems to be provided that no security of any kind can be created in respect of a ship but by way of mortgage, but the words in sect. 55 are exclusively referable to sales. Then, again, the learned judges who put sales and securities on the same footing, did so without hearing any arguments on the point, and their attention was not drawn to the difference between sect. 55 and sect. 66. I am, therefore, not bound by that decision, and indeed, am not sure, that if they had had the point argued out, they would have come to any such conclusion. The case also has been doubted by Baron Pollock in a recent case, Stapleton v. Hymen (infra, col. 3291), but a subsequent statute was passed, I cannot judicially say with the express object of remedying this effect of the Liverpool Borough Bank v. Turner, yet having every appearance of having been so passed, for it certainly makes a very great difference in the law on the subject in question, and the result is to get rid of that judgment; for by that judgment beneficial interests are not recognised except as applying to aliens and foreigners, a construction shown by the subsequent Act not to have been intended. By that later Act it is provided that beneficial interests, when used in the second part of the principal Act, include interest arising under contracts and other equitable interests, and that that Act intended that equities may be enforced against owners and mortgages of ships in respect of their interests therein in the same manner as they may be enforced against them in respect of any other personal property. It is plain, therefore, that this Act was purposely intended to go further and recognise beneficial interests to an extent not recognised in The Liverpool Borough Bank v. Turner.—p. 424.

WILLES, J.—There is one very strong case, Langton v. Horton, where it was held that a bill of sale of a ship, absolute in its terms, might in equity be shown to be a mortgage. But the proceeding there was not on a contract in the bill of sale. Its existence was admitted, and the question was as to the purpose for which it was given. But in this case the dealing was with an instrument on the face of which the defendant appears to be a principal debtor. Now it has been laid down in the courts of law with reference to such instruments that a person signing a bill as principal debtor, must undertake all liabilities, as principal debtor as between himself and third parties, although as between himself and the party at whose instance he signed it, he is in fact only a surety, and that fact is known to the person to whom the bill was given.—p. 112.

CAMPBELL, L.C.—I cannot concur in the unlimited right of the mortgagee to use the ship as the owner might do, notwithstanding the dicta of Wood, V.-C., in European Co. v. Royal Mail Co., which have produced this marginal note, "A mortgagee of a ship has power, under the 70th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1856, to use as well as sell the ship, semble." I doubt whether the enactment in the statute referred to, as to the rights and liabilities of the mortgagee of the ship, which regulate the relation between the mortgagee and third persons, and protect him both from claims founded on contract and on tort till he has taken possession, are intended to vary or regulate the power of the mortgagee as between him and the mortgagor. At any rate they cannot be intended to empower the mortgagee, at the expense and risk of the mortgagor, to send the ship to any quarter of the globe, and to employ her in any trade for which she may be adapted for any indefinite length of time. Is the burthen of repairs, and of paying the master and seamen, and of all the ship's disbursements, to be borne by the mortgagor? Is he to be charged for insurance? And if the ship is wrecked uninsured, is the loss to fall upon him, he being still liable for the balance of the unpaid mortgage money? Nor can I lay down the strict rule that the mortgagee can never lawfully employ the ship to earn freight, or that after taking possession he must allow her to lie idle till he may prudently sell her. He may take possession when she is prosecuting a voyage under a charter-party, and at the end of the voyage it is easy to conceive circumstances which would justify him in a temporary employment of the ship while waiting for a favourable opportunity to sell her.

MELLISH, L.J.—The only case which has been cited was the case of The Jacob; it is unnecessary to say whether that was rightly decided, but it hardly appears to be an authority on the question, for there the subsequent freight had not been hypothecated; but Lord Stowell came to the conclusion that by deviating from the proper voyage, and from going away too early, the shipowner had wrongfully deprived the bottomry bondholder of the freight which really was pledged, namely, the freight to be earned in the current voyage, and that, therefore, it was right, the ship having got away before it could be seized, to hold that the subsequent freight could be seized. Their lordships gave no opinion, whether that was right or wrong, but that case does not appear to be an authority for giving a pledge of the subsequent freight.—p. 210.

BUTT, M.R.—The question of reasonable inquiry by the lender has never been the test of the liability of the shipowner. I think, with deference to the Privy Council, that their language in The Prince of Saxe Coburg was not quite so precise as could have been wished.

I think that the language in that case applies to the bona fides of the lender as affecting the validity of the bond ab initio, and whether it should be pronounced for at all. For if a bond is entered into without the least care or inquiry, or with the intention of imposing on the shipowner, it justifies the Court in declaring it to be void. But the rule that a bond though valid is so only to the extent to which money is needed for the actual necessities of the ship, is founded on the doctrine that by the law of England the master in a foreign port has no authority to bind the shipowner or cargo owner, except in case of necessity. The rule should be even more stringent as regards the cargo owner, for the master does not take goods on board as his agent, and is not his agent at all, unless an overruling necessity arises during the voyage. To assent to the argument urged on the part of the appellants would be to cut away the whole ground on which the authority of the master is based in a foreign port.—p. 180.

LORD CHELMSFORD (for the Court).—The important sentence in that judgment is to be found in p. 470, and is as follows:—"That it is an universal rule that the Master, if in a state of distress or pressure, before hypothecating the cargo, must communicate, or even endeavour to communicate, with the owner of the cargo, has not been alleged, and is a position that could not be maintained; but it may safely, both on authority and on principle, be said that, in general, it is his duty to do so, or it is his duty, in general, to attempt to do so." This sentence is followed by one which in the report is printed as follows:—"If, according to the circumstances in which he is placed it is reasonable that he should, it was rational to expect that he might obtain an answer within a time not inconvenient with reference to the circumstances of the case; it must be taken, therefore, upon authority and principle, that it is the duty of the master to do so, or at least to make the attempt." This passage is obviously inaccurate. The judgment was not written, but appears to have been printed from a shorthand writer's note. It is not, however, difficult to collect what really was said by the learned judge, and, with a slight correction of the text, it would stand thus:—"If, according to the circumstances in which he is placed it be reasonable that he should—if it be rational to expect that he may obtain an answer within a time not inconvenient with reference to the circumstances of the case, then it must be taken upon authority and principle that it is the duty of the master to do so, or at least to make the attempt." That this is the true wording of the passage we have ascertained by communicating with Lord Justice Knight Bruce, who delivered the judgment. It is a most important passage, and the complement and explanation of what goes before. The preceding sentence states that it is the duty of the master in certain circumstances to make an attempt to make the communication, and this sentence explains what the circumstances are in which this duty is imposed upon him. It shows what the learned judge understood by the expression "in general," if such words were used by him. The reporter has accurately stated in his marginal note the general rule established by the decision, though he has unfortunately omitted to correct the press in that portion of the judgment in which it is expressed. In the rule thus enunciated their lordships are unable to discern any novelty, either in the principle on which it rests, or in its application to the case.—p. 602.

SIR MONTAGUE SMITH (for the Court).—The possibility of communicating with the owners must, of course, depend on the circumstances of each case, involving the consideration of the facts which create the urgency for an early sale, the distance of the port from the owners, the means of communication which may exist, and the general position of the master in the particular emergency. Such a communication need only be made when an answer can be obtained, or there is a reasonable expectation that it could be obtained, before the sale. When, however, there is ground for such an expectation, every endeavour, so far as the position in which he is placed will allow, should be made by the master to obtain the owner's instructions. (See the judgment of this Board by Knight Bruce, L.J., in the case of The Bonaparte; the corrected passage is given in the report of The Cargo ex Hamburg, infra, col. 3300).—p. 231.

SIR R. PHILLIMORE.—On the other hand, the case of The Bonaparte was cited to establish the proposition that if owners of cargo had ample information of disasters which had befallen the vessel, there was a sufficient communication. But an examination of the communications made in that case to the owners enables me to reconcile the judgment in it with the preceding case of The Oriental (supra, col. 3298). In that case the owners of the cargo were specially apprised of the injury done, not only to the ship but to the cargo; and, moreover, their advice was specially requested as to what in the circumstances it would be best to do; and it was held that as they chose to pass by the whole matter in silence, and gave no instructions, which had been particularly and immediately requested, the communication was sufficient.—p. 217.

BRETT, L.J.—Sir R. Phillimore in the Court below thought that The Hamburg governed the present case. But I think that it does not govern this case at all; for Dr. Lushington there treated the ship as an English ship, and while administering the maritime law of England, expressed an opinion that he did not know what his decision would have been if there had been any evidence that the maritime law of some other country was different; but there was no such evidence, so that the point did not arise in that case. The P. C. agreed with that decision, and, therefore, in neither Court was it decided which law would have been administered if there had been a conflict of law. . . . Acting upon the principle laid down in Lloyd v. Guibert (infra, col. 3303), and also upon the principle which seems to me to arise from the mercantile contract itself, I think that whoever puts goods on board a foreign ship, puts them on board subject to be dealt with according to the law of the ship's flag, unless the authority of the master is limited by any stipulation in the bill of lading or charter-party.—p. 72.

BARNES, J. — In the present case the two funds belong to different persons — that is, the ship-owner and cargo-owners respectively, and, in my opinion, the necessities men have no right of marshalling. They have no equity to have the claims adjusted so as to compel the cargo-owners in effect to provide the means of discharging the claim for necessities. The case of The Edward Oliver, which was principally relied on by the counsel for the necessities men, does not apply, although the effect of that decision was to compel the cargo-owners to pay a balance which was greater by the exact sum paid to the master out of the proceeds of ship and freight. The master had a lien on the proceeds for the amount of his claim, and it was merely decided that the rule that a master who has bound himself as well as the ship and freight for the payment of a bottomry bond is not entitled to payment of his own claim in priority to that of the bond-holders cannot be invoked by the cargo-owners, and will not be acted on where the bond-holder will not be prejudiced by the master being paid before him.—p. 176.

COCKBURN, C.J.—It was there held that a person who had put goods on board a general ship without any knowledge of the charter-party under which that ship was chartered, was, on discovering the nature of that charter-party, entitled to have his goods returned to him. That appears to be but reasonable; and if, in the present case, when the captain refused to sign the bills of lading, the plaintiffs had directed him to return the cargo to them, different considerations would have arisen; but they did not do anything of the kind. The captain was bound to take the cargo pursuant to the charter-party, that is, he was bound to sign a bill of lading in the usual form, and he was also bound to take the cargo to Bilbao. He did the latter and failed to do the former, but the plaintiffs made no protest as to this, and he proceeded with the full intention of delivering the cargo to their consignees, and so to fulfil the contract. Therefore I am of opinion that there has been no conversion of that cargo.—p. 213.

BRETT, L.J.—The case of Lloyd v. Guibert does not seem to me to govern this case absolutely, because the question there was whether or not a certain stipulation was implied in a contract. The contract was a contract of affreightment, and the question was whether there was to be implied into that contract a stipulation that if certain circumstances arose, and the master delivered up his ship and freight, the shipowner should not be made liable beyond the amount specified. The owner of the ship could only be relieved if there was such a stipulation in the contract of affreightment. There would have been no such stipulation if it was to be judged according to the law of the forum, that is, the law of the English Court. But there would be such a stipulation if the contract of affreightment was to be construed according to the law of the ship. It was there held that inasmuch as the contract of affreightment was made with the master or owner of a foreign ship abroad, the contract was the contract of the country of the ship; in other words, that it was governed by the law of the "flag" of the ship, and inasmuch as in the country of that flag such a contract of affreightment would have had such a stipulation in it, then the English Court would hold that it had this stipulation in it. That is not this case, because the matter here is not the question of the construction of a contract, but of what authority arises out of the fact of a contract having been entered into. Still, if the contract was held there to be a foreign contract because it was made with regard to the shipment of goods on board a foreign ship, the principle governs this case, and would authorise our saying that the authority which arises out of the contract of shipment is the authority which the law of the country of the ship would give to the master; and in accordance with that principle I think this case ought to be decided.—p. 146.

LINDLEY, L.J.—There can, I think, be no doubt that the parties were contracting with reference to English law, and not with reference to the law of the country under whose flag the ship sailed in order to obtain the privilege of trading with Java. This conclusion is not at all at variance with Lloyd v. Guibert, but rather in accordance with it. It is true that in that case the law of the flag prevailed; but the intention of the parties was admitted to be the crucial test; and the law of the ship's flag was considered as the law intended by the parties to govern their contract, as there was really no other law which they could reasonably be supposed to have contemplated.—p. 228.

SMITH, J.—In Scrutton v. Childs it does not seem that I took the right point, I was rather arguing whether the written part [of the charter-party] was to control the printed part. The point I should have taken which has been taken in all the cases since, is that the writing is not contradictory. You have got "taking to and from ship's rail" is to be at merchant's expense. To be loaded and unloaded as customary does not contradict it. It means that the loading and unloading are to be according to the custom of the port, but not as regards the expenses to be borne. I do not know whether Scrutton v. Childs has been expressly, in so many words, overruled; but my opinion is that it cannot stand after Holman v. Wade (Times, 11th May, 1877) and Hayton v. Irwin (5 C. P. D. 130).

DAY, J.—There is no question here of demurrage, but simply whether the captain was bound to proceed to Gloucester. That is a very different question to that considered in Nielsen v. Wait. If a place is not a safe port in the ordinary sense, it is not safe for any ship of this size with such a cargo to attempt to go to Gloucester. I know of no custom which can impose upon the captain the duty of unloading his ship and taking her up to a place without the whole cargo on board. . . . the County Court judge was, I think, wrong in holding that Gloucester was a safe port, having regard to the custom, because the custom is not, in my judgment, incorporated with any contract "that has been" made. The contract is to deliver at a safe port in the ordinary sense, not at a safe port rendered safe by custom. This, to my mind, brings the case entirely within the principle of The Alhambra (supra).—p. 498.

The Rona (1884) 51 L. T. 28; 5 Asp. M. C. 259.—HANNEN, P. and FIELD, J.

FIELD, J.—I myself do not believe that Lush, L.J. (in the above case), intended to lay down any such doctrine as that a passenger, whose duty it is to use due care and skill, may be excused for a breach of that duty simply if he honestly exercises a judgment in doing it. That certainly was not the view which the Court (of which I had the honour of being a member) took of that, but we considered in that case, although the question itself was made a strong point by the Solicitor-General, that it might possibly, taken by itself, have misled the jury, yet when accompanied by the observations of the Lord Justice, in summing-up to the jury, it showed that no such damage was sustained. That was the true effect of Cohn v. Davidson, in my opinion. I cannot see that, in the present case, the master brings himself within that protection, because he took no means and exercised no judgment whatever.—p. 33.

SMITH, L.J.—But there is also the case in this Court in the year 1892 of Thin v. Richards & Co., which I am unable to distinguish on principle from the present. . . . The doubt expressed by Lord Esher as to whether it was a voyage divided into stages seems to me to have been, not that a voyage could never be divided into stages if the necessity of the case required it, but whether in such a comparatively short voyage as from Oran to Liverpool the necessity of dividing the voyage into stages had been established by proof.—pp. 56, 57.

 26 L. J. Ex. 26.—EX.

BRAMWELL, B.—If the contract is to load at a particular port, the very language compels us to construe that as a condition precedent. So in the case of Glaholm v. Hays, where the agreement was that the vessel should sail on a particular day. In the present case the only thing which made me doubt was an expression of Maule, J., in Glaholm v. Hays (which is a dictum rather than an authority). He says, in the course of the argument: "It will be said that if the sailing on the 4th February is a condition precedent, in this case the sailing within a reasonable time would also have been held to be a condition precedent.
 There is a difficulty in saying that one is to be a condition precedent and not the other. But the case of Freeman v. Taylor (8 Bing. 124), is an express authority that the sailing within a reasonable time is not a condition precedent."

SMITH, L.J.—The vessel was to proceed to Bussorah, and it was provided that the charterers should be at liberty to cancel the charter-party if the vessel was not there by the 18th June. The vessel was detained at Delagoa Bay unloading cargo until it was impossible for her to get to Bussorah by the 18th June. . . . Naturally, under the circumstances, the shipowners asked the charterers for an extension of the time for cancellation of the charter, as it was impossible for them to perform their agreement to have the vessel at Bussorah by the 18th June. The charterers refused, and declined to say whether they would or would not load the vessel when she got to Bussorah, but said that, if they did so, the shipowners would have to accept a reduced rate of freight. It seems to me to be most unreasonable for the charterers, under those circumstances, to come to the Court and ask for an injunction, as of right, to prevent the shipowners from sending their vessel upon any voyage except a voyage to Bussorah under this charter-party. . . . The matter of an injunction of this kind was thoroughly threshed out in the cases of De Mattos v. Gibson (see ante, col. 1322), and Serin v. Deslandes, and I agree that, where there is a legal right, ordinarily, the person having that right can come to a Court of equity and obtain an injunction. The rule is, however, subject to this qualification, that the plaintiff must not have done anything which may disentitle him to come to a Court of equity to ask for an injunction. In this case I think that the plaintiffs have so acted as to disentitle them to an injunction.—p. 122.

LINDLEY, L.J.—In the case to which we were referred of The Baumwoll Manufactur von Carl Scheibler v. Furness (infra), the charter was such that the master was not the servant of the shipowner but of the charterer. . . . Counsel for the appellants have exerted themselves very ingeniously to persuade us, on the strength of the case of Colvin v. Newberry, that we ought to hold he is [here] the servant of the charterers. I do not think we ought. In the first place the facts of the two cases are totally different. The case of Newberry v. Colvin was a very curious case. The master there, as far as I understand it, had no principal at all. He was the person navigating the ship, he was the master, and he was doing everything on his own account, subject to some payment by the shipowner. . . . The true view I think is this—that the test is in each case that which was applied by the H. L. in Scheibler v. Furness, whose servant is the master—who is his undisclosed principal when he signs the bills of lading? My answer to that question is that, upon the true construction of the documents here, he was the servant of the shipowner.—pp. 769, 770.

CAMPBELL, C.J. (for the Court).—Reference was made in the argument to the recent case of Brown v. Byrne; but this Court by no means intended there to depart from the principles which we have now laid down; and the marginal note in the report would better express the view taken of the subject, by the judges who concurred in that decision, if it had said that the custom "was not inconsistent with the bill of lading," instead of saying that it "controlled the bill of lading."—p. 510.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The bill of lading is signed as follows:—"By authority of the captain, Wilh. Gauswindt, as agent." That is clearly not the signature of the shipowner, who is the person against whom this counterclaim is made. Therefore the argument, based upon the third section of the Bills of Lading Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 111), falls to the ground. The first section merely gives the indorsee of the bill of lading the right to sue upon the contract contained in it. Then, if we look outside the Act, the case of Grant v. Norway settles the point. The question to be decided was an extremely difficult one before that case, but that case settled it, and, as far as I am aware, has always been acted upon.—p. 350.

SIR H. S. KEATING (for J.C.).—Their lordships collect from the report of a case which has been laid before them (The Prosperino Palasso), that if the learned judge had come to the conclusion which their lordships have, that no evidence had been given by the plaintiffs of the conditions of the cargo when shipped, he would have found for the defendants. Their lordships cannot, indeed, suppose that the learned judge intended to lay down, as the marginal note to the case represents him, that there is a rule of law which requires that a plaintiff in such a case as this must show, in the first instance, that the goods were shipped in good order and condition, or fail in his suit. Undoubtedly there is no such rule of law.—p. 544.

ESHER, M.R.—Unless, therefore, there is something to justify this Court in disregarding the principles of the construction of bills of lading adopted in a long course of cases, the proposition to be found in "Carver on Carriage of Goods by Sea" (2nd ed.) p. 89, which appears to be the result of a careful consideration of those cases, is right. It is there said: "But if a loss apparently falls within an exception, the burden of showing that the shipowner is not entitled to the benefit of the exception, on the ground of negligence, is upon the person so contending." I adopt that principle, and think that it is right. It is said that that is not the opinion given by Lord Herschell in Wilson v. The Xantho. I have a great respect for Lord Herschell's opinion, but, reading the words he used, I think that he positively declined to give any opinion upon the point. It is said that the tendency of his mind can be seen through his words, but as far as I can see he refuses to give any opinion; and I do not feel at all hampered by what is supposed to be his view, because I think that if ever the case comes before him he will not act in accordance with the supposition. I think, therefore, that the burden of proof of the defendant's negligences lies upon the plaintiffs.—p. 92.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I do not think that anybody accustomed to the use of ordinary language could, without torturing words, come to the conclusion that the negligence relied upon in this case was negligence "in the navigation" of the ship. We have been invited to come to a contrary conclusion upon the authority of Laurie v. Douglas. I certainly do not mean to say that Laurie v. Douglas was wrongly decided; it may be that the fact that there the vessel had broken away from her moorings may distinguish it from the case now before us; but if the decision in Laurie v. Douglas leads to a different conclusion from that at which we have arrived in this case, I can only say that I do not agree with it.—p. 93.

SIR R. PHILLIMORE.—In questions arising on exceptions introduced into contracts of affreightment, the Court is bound to look to the real, and not merely, as in cases of marine insurance, to the proximate cause of the loss. The only authority cited to the contrary has been a dictum in The Freedom, where the learned judge, who delivered the judgment to the Privy Council, says: "The words 'perils of the seas' in the bill of lading must of course be taken in the sense in which they are used in a policy of insurance. It is a settled rule of the law of insurance not to go into distinct causes, but to look exclusively to the immediate or proximate cause of the loss." This dictum was in no way necessary to the decision of the case before their lordships, and it appears to me that it was an erroneous dictum that must have found its way through inadvertence into their lordships' judgment.—p. 448.

Thompson v. Brown (1817) 7 Taunt. 656.—C.P. GIBBS, C.J. (for the Court).—The maxim of law which meets one in this case is, that matters "which are contracted for by deed cannot be dissolved except by deed." The deed stipulates that the delivery shall be at London, and the question is whether Liverpool shall be substituted. The objection is, that the stipulation by deed cannot be dissolved by parol. At the same time, the doctrine of Lord Mansfield, C.J., and Buller, J., in the case of Hotham v. East India Co., certainly is extremely strong. p. 670. . . . Those judges, in giving judgment on the case, were obliged to consider the effect of the charter-party, because it was on the effect of the charter-party that the issues must be decided, and they do in express terms say that if an agreement had been made in the course of the voyage, that the cargo should be delivered at a different port from that stipulated for in the charter-party, and if that substituted contract was performed, the compensation for it might be recovered in an action of covenant framed on the charter-party. It is very singular that in no subsequent case is that doctrine ever alluded to or introduced, though many cases must have occurred to which it would apply. Possibly the Courts have not thought it necessary further to consider a mere dictum; but I can find no judgment of any Court in which the Court has referred to those dicta. In one, and only in one, case do the counsel in argument allude to them, but the Court does not notice the argument. In such circumstances, therefore, we are to look to subsequent decisions, and see how far such dicta, though coming from so high an authority, have been recognised. On the other hand, we find in previous as well as in latter decisions many things which have an aspect the other way. p. 671. . . . Upon consideration of all these cases, we feel ourselves compelled to say that, notwithstanding the high authority of those dicta in the case of Hotham v. East India Co., those cases "in which a contrary doctrine has prevailed are of higher authority."—p. 674.

LORD BLACKBURN.—In Fearon v. Bowers, decided in 1753, Lee, C.J., is reported to have ruled, "that it appeared by the evidence that, according to the usage of trade, the captain was not concerned to examine who had the best right on the different bills of lading. All he had to do was to deliver the goods upon one of the bills of lading, which was done. The jury were therefore directed by the Chief Justice to find a verdict for the defendant." Lord Tenterden says (I quote from the 5th edition of Abbott on Shipping, the last published in his lifetime, Part III., Chap. IX., sect. 24), "But perhaps this rule might, upon further consideration, be held to put too much power into the master's hands." It is singular enough that 129 years should have elapsed without its having been necessary for any Court to say whether this rule was good law. It was suggested on the argument with great probability that, especially after the caution given immediately after the passage I have read (Part III., Chap. IX., sect. 25), masters have declined to incur the responsibility of deciding between two persons claiming under different parts of the bill of lading, so that the case has not arisen. If this rule were the law, it would follow, a fortiori, that if the master was entitled to choose between two conflicting claims, of both of which he had notice, and deliver to either holder, he must be justified in delivering to the only one of which he had notice. So that I think it is necessary to consider whether it is law, and I do not think it can be law, for the reason given by Lord Tenterden; it puts too much power in the master's hands. Where he has notice, or probably even knowledge of the other indorsement, I think he must deliver, at his peril, to the rightful holder, or interplead.—p. 610.

Mr. Justice Field seems to have taken a view of the facts as to the way in which the goods came into the hands of the dock company different from that which I have taken, and consequently to have thought that the very important question suggested by Lord Westbury did not arise. Lord Justice Brett thinks that the master cannot be excused as against the first assignee of one part of the bill who has the legal right to the property, for delivering under any circumstances to one who produces another bill of lading bearing a genuine indorsement, unless he would be excused in all circumstances; in other words, unless Learon v. Bowers is good law to its full extent. In this I cannot agree. I think, as I have already said, that when the master has notice that there has been an assignment of another part of the bill of lading, the master must interplead or deliver to the one who he thinks has the better right, at his peril if he is wrong.—p. 613.

SIR BARNES PEACOCK (for the Court).—This case differs entirely from Rodger's Case, because the bill of lading in that case was not handed over at the time, but was handed over in pursuance of the agreement generally to hand over all bills. In this case it was handed over specially at the time, in consideration of the release and of the abandonment of proceedings for not delivering over the shipping documents. It therefore appears that the bank did obtain the legal right to the goods by the indorsement of the bill of lading for a valuable consideration, and whether they afterwards actually received possession of the goods or not they had a legal title to them without notice, and that legal title was not affected by the equity arising out of the circumstances under which the goods were sold by Messrs. Henderson & Co. to Lyall, Still & Co. This case comes entirely within the case of Henderson & Co. v. The Comptoir d'Escompte de Paris, in which their lordships held that the bank got the legal title to the goods, and that that legal title was not affected by the equity arising from the terms upon which the goods were originally sold.

BRAMWELL, L.J. (for the Court).—In support of his argument Mr. Webster cited Rodger v. Comptoir d'Escompte de Paris before the Judicial Committee of the P. C. We think that that case justifies his argument, and is in point. There may be differences in the facts of the two cases, but the ratio decidendi was clearly that advanced for the defendants in the present case. We are not bound by its authority, but we need hardly say that we should treat any decision of that tribunal with the greatest respect, and rejoice if we could agree with it. But we cannot. There is not a trace of such distinction between cases of past and present consideration to be found in the books. It is true there is no decision the other way; but wherever the rule is laid down it is laid down without qualification, viz., that a transfer of a bill of lading for valuable consideration to a bona fide transferee defeats the right of stoppage in transitu.

WICKENS, V.-C.—But then I have been pressed very much with the observations of Lord Campbell in Gurney v. Behrend, upon the question whether the plaintiffs acquired any title under this bill of lading thus delivered to them by Waite, who got it, as defendants contend, irregularly, and without their consent or knowledge, by a mistake on the part of their messenger. The defendants, however, had full authority to deliver it to Waite, as they thought fit. It was in the hands of their servants for the purpose, and the only question is, whether by the course of trade any such custom as that stated by the defendants—that it is the practice not to deliver the bill of lading to the intended vendee until he shall have taken up his acceptances on account thereof—has been established. So far, however, from that being the usual course, it is expressly referred to by Crompton, J., during the argument in Gurney v. Behrend, as being an exceptional course, only adopted in times of suspicion and peril. I can quite understand such a term being inserted in the contract, if any one should be foolish enough to consent to it; but I am not at all satisfied that any such custom as that alleged by the defendants has been established.—p. 503.

ORESWELL, J.—It seems to me that the case of Marquand v. Banner proceeded upon the authority of Colvin v. Newberry (ante, col. 3315), in which the H. L. affirmed the judgment of the Ex. Ch. in Newberry v. Colvin (col. 3315), which reversed the judgment of the K. B. in Colvin v. Newberry (col. 3315); but in that case the charterers were owners of the ship pro tempore. The contracts were made with the captain as owner, and not as agent. Here (in Gilkison v. Middleton) the captain was still the agent of the shipowners.

MALINS, V.-C.—It is very true that the Master of the Rolls, in this case, says that where there is a charter-party inquiries should be made, and notice should be given. I am rather disposed to think that that is rather a dangerous doctrine, because I think the mortgagee of a ship has a right to say: "I am going to take the ship: I am going to realise my security: I know nothing whatever besides, for nobody has given me any notice." I am rather disposed to think that if he takes a mortgage of the ship, and registers it, he is not bound to make further inquiries; but however that may be, what the Master of the Rolls says is, that where the mortgagee knows there is a charter-party he should inquire of the charterer whether he has received notice of any incumbrance: that may be so, but it was impossible for this defendant to do that, because here there was no charter-party.—p. 427.

WALTON, J.—In Brown v. Tanner, the L.JJ. in 1868 had to deal with a question as to a mortgagee's right to freight. In delivering the judgment of the Court, Page Wood, L.J. said:

"It appears to us that this case must be determined in the appellant's favour on the ground of his having taken possession of the ship before the freight under the charter-party had become due. It is now settled beyond all dispute that the mortgagee of a ship becomes entitled to all the rights and liable to all the duties of an owner from the time of his taking possession. Amongst the rights so accruing to him is that of receiving all freight remaining due when possession is taken." The defendants rely upon the last sentence in this passage of the judgment as indicating that, in the opinion of the L.J., the mortgagee on taking possession became entitled to all freights then due and unpaid. I think, however, that the L.J. meant no more than that the mortgagee on taking possession became entitled to all unpaid freight which the ship was then in the course of earning. This seems clear from what follows in the judgment. . . . And the L.J. . . . comes to the conclusion that the freight had not been earned before the mortgagee took possession, and that therefore the mortgagee was entitled to it.

TINDAL, C.J. (for the Court).—But there is no authority for saying that, under such circumstances, there is a contract raised by law to pay the freight which another, viz., the consignee, has contracted with the shipowner to pay. Upon principle, it cannot be contended that the contract runs with the property in the goods and is transferred with it: and there is no decision to that effect. We do not dispute the propriety of the judgment in Cock v. Taylor (13 East 399) which may be treated as the origin of questions of this nature; but that decision was merely that the receipt of the goods under the bill of lading was evidence of a new agreement; it is so spoken of by all the judges. In the subsequent case of Wilson v. Kymer (1 M. & S. 157), the previous mode of carrying on business between the parties was held to be evidence of the same nature; and it was left to the jury to consider whether they would imply a similar promise from the former habits of dealing, by the evidence of the defendant having obtained the goods under orders from the consignor, but having paid the freight; and though some of the judges, particularly Mr. Justice Le Blanc, in the subsequent case of Moorson v. Kymer, speak as if Cock v. Taylor (supra) had decided that the law would imply a promise, it is evident that the expression is an inaccurate one and not justified by the case itself. The ground on which the latter case is distinguished from the former by all the judges except Lord Ellenborough, viz., that there was a remedy for the same freight by the shipowner against the consignor, cannot certainly be supported.—p. 295.

HERSCHELL, L.C.—Now, it is not disputed that where a consignee takes delivery under a bill of lading, and the master of the vessel by giving delivery abandons his lien, there is evidence from which a contract to pay freight may be inferred. This has been regarded as the law ever since Sanders v. Vanzeller; but in that case it was distinctly stated that it was not a presumption of law that such a contract existed, but only a presumption of fact.

HALSBURY, L.C.—The word “port” is undoubtedly ambiguous, but dealing with a policy of insurance I have no doubt that what is meant by the word “port” is what Lord Esher in Sailing Ship Garston Co. v. Hickie describes as what shippers of goods, charterers of vessels, and shipowners would mean by a port, that is to say, that a legal port might be according to the general understanding of the classes of persons described by Lord Esher, either restricted or enlarged by mercantile usage. . . . What the M.R. said in the case already quoted suggests what are the proper tests to apply where the question arises whether the vessel has or has not arrived at the port at which she is to deliver her cargo.—pp. 722, 723.

BOWEN, L.J.—There [in Smith v. Pyman] the advance freight was to be paid “if required,” and therefore there was no absolute right to have it paid and no absolute right to have the bills of lading signed; it was only an option given to the shipowner. That was the ground upon which the Court explained in that case that the loss of the ship determined the right to advance freight, viz., that the advance freight depended upon an option to be exercised within a reasonable time, and the object being to allow, the charterers to insure showed that it was too late to exercise the option if it was too late for the charterers to insure. The present case is a case of an absolute right, not of an optional right to be enforced at a certain time or not at all. In the present case there is nothing to show that the bills of lading might not be presented and signed after the loss of the ship.—p. 133.

LORD HATHERLEY.—I do not think that the case of Kirchner v. Venus has any bearing upon the case before your lordships. Of course, any opinion of Lord Kingsdown is always cited by those who can cite it as an authority at all for their proposition, and it certainly carries with it great weight. But Mr. Justice Brett, whose opinion is of very great value, I think, in assisting your lordships to arrive at a correct view of this case, dealt with Kirchner v. Venus in the mode in which, in my opinion, it ought to be dealt with, and in which all judgments should be dealt with, namely, by taking it as applied to the subject-matter. What Lord Kingsdown there says is this:—"In the first place, it is not that prepayments are not freight, but that they are not the same thing as freight, having all the legal incidents of freight; and, in the second place, there is the case of lien." Applying Lord Kingsdown's opinion to the subject-matter, you will not find him saying that prepaid freight is not freight, because it is freight to all intents and purposes. In settling the account you say,
"That is a part of the freight," in this case and in every other case where freight comes to be adjusted.—p. 239.

BRETT, J.—Since this case was argued, and since this judgment was written, our attention has been called to the case of McLean v. Fleming in the House of Lords, and if I had thought that that case overruled anything I have said in this, I should have willingly bowed to it. But in that case, as I understand the judgment, the charter-party was in respect of the carriage of a uniform cargo, and the freight was payable at a fixed sum per ton, and the charter-party ascertained the amount of the cargo that was to be loaded. It then put upon the charterers the liability of loading full cargo, and gave a lien to the shipowner for dead freight. Now, under those circumstances, it was pointed out by some, if not all, of the learned lords who took part in the judgment that the damages for not loading a full cargo were, in point of fact, ascertained, because they would be the specified amount per ton upon the quantity that was really ascertained; and if that were so, that would properly be dead freight within the ordinary meaning of the term, and the lien being given in terms for dead freight, that case would be within the recognised rule; and as I understand their lordships, they declined to overrule the case of Kirchner v. Venus (supra, col. 3346), and expressly declined to overrule the case of Pearson v. Goschen (17 C. B. N. S. 352), which I think is decided on valuable principles, that ought to be generally applied. I therefore do not consider that that case overrules what I have said of this charter-party. With regard to the question of the bill of lading, even although the charter in this case did give a lien for dead freight, it seems to me that the authority in the House of Lords leaves the case untouched, because the House of Lords in the case before it came to the conclusion that the action was between those who were virtually the charterers and the shipowner, and, therefore, they decided the case on the charter-party alone and held only that the fact of bills of lading being given to a charterer cannot alter or affect his liability under the charter-party. It therefore seems to me that that case does not affect this case, and I adhere to the judgment which I had already written.—p. 221.

ESHER, M.R.—I think that the real decision in that case [Gray v. Carr] was that the effect of the words "all other conditions as per charter-party," was to introduce into the bill of lading all the conditions of the charter-party to be performed by the receiver of the goods—that is by the consignee. . . . Then I think that Gray v. Carr followed Russell v. Niemann (supra, col. 3325). . . . I do not think the learned judge [Mr. Justice Wills in the latter case] intended to limit the words to the mere payment of freight and matters strictly of that kind; but I think his meaning was that which was adopted by the majority of the Court in Gray v. Carr.—p. 307.

case] provided that at the port of loading, after the agreed days for loading, the captain was to receive £5 a day for demurrage, day by day.
For the port of discharge the language was different. There was to be demurrage after the laying days at £5 a day. It was considered that the express agreement that the charterer should pay £5 a day, day by day, showed that the clause providing that the owners should rest on their lien for freight and demurrage, must apply to the demurrage at the port of discharge. The judgments are founded upon the use of the words “day by day,” in connection with the payment of demurrage at the port of loading, and there is nothing of that sort in the present case.

CLEASBY, B. (for the Court).—That decision is certainly not applicable to the present case, because we have in this charter-party a demurrage clause though not a precise one. In the present case the clause provides that the ship shall be discharged in ten working days and afterwards has these words: “Demurrage at 2l. per 100 tons register per day.” It has also been decided that where there is a time specified for loading and also a time for unloading fixed by its being at the rate of so many tons a day and afterwards a demurrage clause for a fixed number of days at one agreed price per day, then in that case the exemption clause applies to demurrage whether at the port of loading or of discharge, but it was thought clear that it did not apply to detention beyond the ten days and demurrage days at the port of loading. This was Francesco v. Massey (infra, col. 3352). The effect of that decision is that where there is a clause for demurrage at a specified rate for a certain number of days, and a number of days being allowed for loading there can be demurrage in the proper sense at the port of loading, the exemption clause applies to demurrage there.

Bannister v. Breslauer, observed on.

COLERIDGE, C.J.—Now, in mercantile contracts which are drawn with reference to decided cases, it is important stare decisis, and whatever might have been my impression apart from the cases cited before us, I am not prepared to overrule them, and therefore I accept Francesco v. Massey (col. 3352) as a binding authority. Bannister v. Breslauer, which was referred to in the argument, was an action on a charter-party, in which no days for demurrage were specified, but it contained a clause that the charterer's liability should cease upon shipping the cargo, provided the same should be worth the freight on arrival at the port of discharge, the captain having an absolute lien on it for demurrage. A delay having occurred in loading, the shipowners sued the charterers. The Court of Common Pleas in effect held that, as the lien for demurrage could there apply only to detention, as distinguished from demurrage properly so called, the charterers were exempt from liability. The reasoning on which that case was decided has been questioned, and perhaps on strict examination does not appear perfectly accurate; but it seems to me that the decision itself was perfectly right, and, upon a charter-party containing a similar provision, I should be prepared to adhere to Bannister v. Breslauer.—p. 558.

ESHER, M.R.—It is not necessary that I should refer to the decided cases, except once more to strike at Bannister v. Breslauer, and to say that if that case decides that if the charter clause relieves the charterer from liability, notwithstanding that the shipowner is thereby left wholly unprotected against delay at the port of loading, it is contrary to the current of decided cases and cannot be supported.—p. 390.

BOWEN, L.J.—If Bannister v. Breslauer is to be supported at all it must be upon the ground that no other meaning can be given to "demurrage," and no other extent to the lien created, than that the one includes and the other extends to damages for detention at the port of loading.—p. 391. SELBORNE, L.C.—If your lordships should agree that the present appeal ought to be dismissed, you will, I think, be adhering to the principle of Rodgers v. Forresters and Burmester v. Hodgson (col. 3356), which does not appear to me to be inconsistent with that of the later authorities. Two recent cases were much relied upon in the arguments of the appellant's counsel—Ford v. Cotesworth (col. 3358) and Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Co. (col. 3360). That of Ford v. Cotesworth is, I think, perfectly consistent with the earlier cases. The judgment of the Court of Error turned upon a risu major, which the Court held to have impeded the master of the ship, as well as the agent of the charterer, from performing his part in the discharge of the vessel. But at the trial the jury was told by the Lord Chief Justice of England (in my opinion correctly, nor do I perceive that the Court of Error thought otherwise) that "the question whether the time was reasonable or unreasonable ought to be judged with reference to the means and facilities available at the port, and to the facilities and course of business at the port." In the other case, Wright v. The New Zealand Shipping Co., which is at first sight much more favourable to the appellant, there were special circumstances on which the decision might very well have been founded, but to which (as it does not appear to me to have been, in fact, founded upon them) I do not more particularly refer. The distinctions between that case and the present (whether the doctrine laid down in it can be supported or not), are, that there no express reference was made in the contract to the custom of the port, and that, if such a reference ought to be implied, no custom or other circumstances existed which would have made it impossible for the charterer, by the use of reasonable diligence, to provide himself with lighters for the discharge of the cargo earlier than he did.—p. 609.

ESHER, M.R.—What are "running days?" It is a nautical phrase. "Running days" are those days on which a ship in the ordinary course is running. It is true that when they are lay days, they do not take effect under the charter-party until the ship has done running; but the parties are describing the days about which they are talking, namely, days in a port, according to the phraseology which they use with regard to a ship at sea. "Running days," therefore, mean the whole of every day when a ship is running. What is that? That is every day, day and night. There it is as plain as possible. They are the days during which, if the ship were at sea, she would be running. That means every day. Now, Lord Abinger, C.B., in Brown v. Johnson, pointed out that "days," inasmuch as they are working days, do in point of fact mean the same as "running days," because if so many days for loading and unloading are mentioned in a charter-party, not only working days are intended but every day, including Sundays and holidays. Therefore "running days" comprehend every day including Sundays and holidays, and "running days" and "days" are the same.—p. 72.

LINDLEY, L.J. Under the contract the cargo was to be discharged within a certain number of days according to the terms of the charter-party. There was also a further stipulation that the charterers should take the risk of unloading from and alongside the ship. That stipulation is unconditional in its terms. The Court below called that contract an absolute contract—that is, the contract on the part of the consignees to pay demurrage for delay and detention of the ship during unloading was an absolute contract. Therefore, as there is no express condition, is there any implied condition of which the merchant freighters can avail themselves? In order to ascertain whether there is, we must consider the decisions on the subject. It was contended on behalf of the plaintiffs that there is an implied condition that the shipowners shall be ready and willing to perform their part of the contract; and that if they do not, then the freighters are exonerated. The authorities are, to my mind, conclusive that there is no such implied condition. If that proposition be true then This v. Byers, Porteous v. Watney (infra) and Straker v. Kidd (47 L. J. B. 365) were wrongly decided; but, in my opinion, they were rightly decided.—p. 7.

MATHEW, J.—With all respect to the learned judges who decided Davies v. McVeagh, I think that case is inconsistent with all the decisions which were referred to by the defendant's counsel in argument in this case. It is to be observed that the attention of the Court in Davies v. McVeagh does not appear to have been called to the fact that, under the charter-party, the High Level Dock was the place of destination. On the contrary, it seems to have been assumed that the Wellington Dock was the place of destination. In the case of Strahan v. Gabriel (not reported) mentioned in the judgment of Brett, L.J., in Nelson v. Dahl (12 Ch. D. at pp. 589, 590), the facts were the same as in the present case, with the single exception that the charter-party did not give an option to the charterer with respect to the place of destination. The distinction that here an option is given to the charterer does not, in my view, prevent that case from covering this in principle.—p. 90.

White v. SS. Winchester Co. (1886) 13 Ct. of Sess. Cas. (4th series) 524.

LORD SHAND.—In conclusion I may say that perhaps the main difficulty I have felt in reaching the result to which I have come, without much hesitation, in the present case, has arisen from the fact that the noble and learned Lord Blackburn has in the case of Hudson v. Ede, (infra, col. 3366), and in Postlethwaite v. Freeland, referred to quarantine in such terms as to support the argument that his lordship regarded detention from that cause as similar in its legal consequences, to detention caused by ice or other natural or ordinary impediments. But in the former of these cases his lordship, in referring to quarantine, regarded it only from the point of view that this might prevent the charterer having his cargo forward, or bringing it alongside the ship, and does not seem to have had the care of the ship herself, being disqualified to receive cargo in view; while the latter merely contains a reference to a practice which has been sometimes followed, of providing that ship's quarantine or other impediments shall excuse the merchant. His lordship has not said that in the case of quarantine, where the ship is directly affected, such a provision is necessary for the charterer's protection.—p. 538.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—As regards Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Co. (col. 3360), in my judgment it is not now law, dissented from and discussed as it has been on different occasions, and especially by Lord Blackburn in Postlethwaite v. Freeland, and inconsistent as it is with the two cases in the H. L. If, however, Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Co. is to be upheld upon the ground suggested by Lord Herschell in Hick v. Raymond (col. 3353)—namely, that it was not shown in that case that the cargo-owner could not by reasonable precautions or exertions have procured the necessary lighters elsewhere or earlier, and so have avoided the delay which took place—then, if that be the ground of the decision, the case is not hostile to the defendants, for the findings in this case are that they had taken all reasonable precautions and exertions, and done their best as regards the discharge of the cargo, and the case has therefore no application to the present.—p. 893.

BUTT, J.—I am asked on the authority of Murphy v. Coffin, a decision of a Divisional Court, to treat the conclusions in the case of Daries v. McVeagh supra, col. 3361 as of no value. The learned judges who decided the case of Murphy v. Coffin do not say that it did not apply, but they say boldly that they think it is a wrong decision, because it is inconsistent with other cases, and because they think the attention of the Court of Appeal was not properly called to some facts in the case. With all deference to the Divisional Court I should be bound to prefer the judgment of the Court of Appeal if I had no opinion of my own; but I have a strong opinion that the Court of Appeal knew perfectly well what it was about when it decided the case of Daries v. McVeagh, and I therefore give judgment for the plaintiffs.—p. 38.

CHARLES, J.—But the difference between that case [Grant v. Coverdale] and this is, as it seems to me, that in dealing with the facts of that case the H. L. drew the inference that the cargo was one which might have been supplied from anywhere else besides from the places where in point of fact it was stored. . . . Now, in this case it seems to me that, according to known mercantile usage, as proved by witnesses on both sides, the only place from which a cargo of salt is brought to be loaded at Liverpool or Birkenhead is from the storehouses on the river Weaver, and that being so, Hudson v. Ede (supra, col. 3366) applies. . . . I think Hudson v. Ede, and not Grant v. Coverdale, governs the present case.—pp. 288, 289.

BAYLEY, J.—I am not convinced by Atty v. Parish that where a contract appears on the face of a declaration to be such that the plaintiff may recover, whether the contract be by deed or not, that it is necessary to declare upon the deed if there be one. The strong impression upon my mind is that upon principle, although there be a deed between the parties, yet if there be a debt independent of the deed, the amount of which, however, is to be ascertained by the deed, the existence of the deed will not prevent the party from recovering that debt upon the common counts.—p. 968.

CHANNELL, J.—In this case the charter-party provides that a ship whose carrying capacity is 2,880 tons shall load "a cargo of ore, say, about 2,800 tons." The charterer provided a cargo of 2,840 tons, and the question is whether by doing so he performed the obligation imposed upon him by the charter-party. What is "about" so many tons—that is, how much margin is to be allowed on one side or the other—is no doubt strictly a question for the jury. It was so regarded in Morris v. Levison, and the Court there dealt with the question themselves, because that case was reserved to them upon the terms that they might draw inferences of fact. Brett, J., treating the question as one of fact, there found that anything less than 3 per cent., one way or other, could be considered to be "about" the specified quantity, but that a greater margin could not be allowed. The question is no doubt strictly for the jury; but in this case the parties do not seem to have desired that it should go to the jury, and, indeed, it was hardly necessary that it should go to them, because it cannot be seriously disputed that the cargo provided was a cargo of "about" 2,800 tons. The important question is whether or not this charter-party differs from that which was under consideration in Morris v. Levison. The charter-party in that case provided that the vessel should load "a full and complete cargo . . . say, about 1,100 tons." The capacity of the vessel was 1,210 tons, which was greater than "about" the quantity specified in the charter. On the principle, that effect should be given to all the words of a contract, it was necessary to put a construction upon the words "say about 1,100 tons," that should, so far as possible, be consistent with the words "full and complete cargo." It was held that in the circumstances the former words should be read as meaning the largest amount they were capable of meaning—namely, 3 per cent. more than the amount specified. As pointed out in the subsequent case of Carnegie v. Conner (59 L. J. Q. B. 122; 24 Q. B. D. 45), the judgments of the Court in Morris v. Levison proceeded entirely upon the ground that there the charter-party contained the words "a full and complete cargo." In this charter-party, however, the expression used is not "a full and complete" cargo, but simply a "cargo." . . . Here the cargo is very nearly indeed a full and complete cargo for the vessel, and I therefore think that it was clearly a cargo for the vessel, and that it was unnecessary to leave it to the jury to say whether it was or was not a cargo; in fact there was no evidence to go to the jury that it was not a cargo.—p. 430.

FRY, L.J.—Feise v. Wray was cited to show that in the case of the foreign agent buying for his English principal there is the relationship of vendor and purchaser, but Grove, J., there says: "What is this but the plain and common case of the consignor of goods who has not received payment for them stopping them in transitu before they get to the hands of the consignee? It is said that no such right exists in the case of a factor against his principal. If this were a case of a factor and principal merely, I should find difficulty in saying that it did.

WILDE, C.J.—In Abbott on Shipping (8th ed.)
the learned author goes on to say: "Thus, if it be necessary to unload the goods, in order to repair the damage done to a ship by a tempest, or by collision with another vessel, so as to enable her to prosecute and complete her voyage, it has been held that the expense of unloading, warehousing, and re-shipping the goods shall be sustained by general contribution, because all persons are interested in the execution of the measures necessary to the completion of the voyage." The reason there assigned might be applicable to the case the author had in his mind, Plummer v. Wildman; but as a general proposition it is too large, it would throw upon the skipper much of the expense which properly belongs to the shipowner. In that case there were undoubtedly some expressions of Lord Ellenborough which would seem to justify the passage; but in the subsequent case of Power v.
Whitmore (4 M. & Selw. 141), his lordship explains that that decision proceeded upon the ground that the master "was compelled to cut away his rigging in order to preserve the ship, and afterwards put into port to repair that which he sacrificed." The expressions, therefore, in Plummer v. Wildman are repudiated and explained away—p. 608.

BRAMWELL, L.J. (for the Court).—That was not a case of general average. The plaintiffs had chartered the defendant's ship, loaded the whole cargo, part of which by the charter was to be, and was, deck cargo, and were held entitled to a contribution from the ship, and with reason. They were not seeking it from other cargo owners, but from the shipowner who shared the benefit, and ought in reason to share the risk, of the deck cargo. As Mr. Benjamin pointed out, the counsel for the shipowner never contested the plaintiffs' right if it was a case of sacrifice. The counsel for the plaintiffs, indeed, did contend for what was not contested: why
one cannot see, unless to show that though deck cargo, it was not wreck but sacrificed. But what is the judgment? "The question is, what is wreck?" (19 C. B. (N.S.), p. 581.) Mr. Justice Willes discusses that. Then he says (p. 583): "In this case there was a deck cargo. . . . When you have established that it is a deck cargo lawfully there by the contract of the parties, it becomes subject to the rule of general average."
Now, certainly, that last sentence gives some colour to the plaintiffs' contention. But the learned judge should be understood as speaking in relation to the subject-matter. It was not a claim for general average as against any other

against him, and is said to be subject to the "rule" of general average. If Mr. Justice Willes had said that it could have been maintained against other cargo owners, had there been any, it would have been wholly extrajudicial, for there were none. But he did not say nor mean to say so. For he says, "The deck cargo was within the contemplation of the parties," which would not be true of other cargo owners. The case, then, was not one of general average. It was as though the plaintiffs were owners of such cargo, and A. owner of other cargo, and A. had agreed to contribute if deck cargo was jettisoned.—p. 69.

LORD BLACKBURN.—I think, on examining the two adjustments, and exercising the power which I have assumed to be given, there can be no doubt that the cargo on board the ship, leaking to the extent which she did, was not safe even in harbour until the ship was so far lightened that she could be taken into dry dock. Should the expense of reloading her, after the repairs were made, be charged to freight, the goods having been taken out under such circumstances? I think it should. I am afraid I have not understood the reasoning on which Cockburn, C.J., in his judgment in Attwood v. Sellar comes to a different conclusion. If I have, I must express dissent from it.—p. 417.

LORD HERSCHHELL.—The learned judges in the Court below rested their judgment mainly on the law laid down by Lord Tenterden in the case of Simonds v. White. . . . The words relied on are that the shippers must be understood to assent to the adjustment of general average "at the usual and proper place." In their lordships' opinion, however, these words do not refer to the preparation of an average statement, but to the actual settlement and adjustment of the general average contributions. The preparation of a general average statement which does not bind the shipper is not "the adjustment" of general average. In order to understand Lord Tenterden's language, it is necessary to bear in mind what would happen if all parties stood on their rights. The shipowner would hold the goods until he obtained the general average contribution to which they were subject. If the owner of the goods disputed his claim, he would appeal to the tribunals of the country to obtain possession of them on payment of what was due. These tribunals would have to determine whether the owner of the goods was entitled to them and what payment he must make to release them. It would naturally follow, as Lord Tenterden said, that the parties must be understood as consenting to the adjustment according to the law there administered. But all this has, in their lordships' opinion, nothing to do with the mere employment by the shipowner of an average adjuster to prepare a statement on his behalf. In Lord Tenterden's time professional average adjusters were not as commonly to be found in the different ports of discharge as they are at present.—p. 80.

BRETT, L.J.—The saving of life alone without saving something more, such as ship or cargo, which will realise a fund out of which salvage may be paid, is not sufficient. It is said that there are cases to the contrary, and that the condition that something more than life must be saved is got rid of where life alone is saved by the exertions of the salvors at the request of the captain, and that in such a case the owner is bound to pay for the services so rendered. In support of this, The Undaunted was cited, and it was said that The E. U. (supra, col. 3385), the authority upon which that case was decided, was in favour of the plaintiff's contention; and more particularly something which was said by Dr. Lushington in the latter case. But the case of The Undaunted does not carry the present case sufficiently far; for the ship was there saved by the salvors, so that there was a fund out of which some salvage could be paid. The question

there was whether the plaintiffs could be paid out of that fund, and the answer was that, inasmuch as they had exerted themselves at the request of the captain towards salvage, they could claim something out of the fund which existed by reason of other people having saved the ship. I will not say whether I agree with that decision or not, but it differs from this, and does not conflict with the fundamental law of the Admiralty Court, which is, that no salvage is due unless something is saved. The E. U. is a similar case; but one of the supposititious cases there put by Dr. Lushington, as to an anchor being put on board a ship which is afterwards lost, is supposed to carry this case. But if that case was put, it is contrary to what has been said in other cases, and it is remarkable that the words "at the request of the captain" are omitted. I doubt whether the supposititious case would have been decided in favour of the unsuccessful salvors. Neither The E. U. nor The Undaunted, therefore, carry the plaintiffs on the argument here.—p. 50.

DR. LUSHINGTON.—In the case of The Maria, the effect of the charter-party was to divest the owners of the possession and control of the vessel, and to transfer the same for the time to the charterer, who was required to provide and pay for the master and crew. And it was on this ground—the ground of the charterer being in possession of the salvaged vessel—that the judgment proceeded. The Court held, that the claim for salvage could not be maintained against the owners of the salvaged vessel by the charterer of that vessel in his other capacity as owner of the vessels rendering the salvage services, or by his servants on board those vessels. In the present case, the circumstances are obviously different. The charterers of The Collier were not in possession; the owners paid the wages of the crew.—p. 85.

MELLISH, L.J.—The Maria Jane . . . is said to be an authority that in no case where the ships belong to the same owners can any salvage remuneration be recovered. But when the facts of that case are looked at, their lordships do not think that Dr. Lushington intended to lay down any such general rule. There the ships belonging to the same owner were engaged in the African trade. It is stated in the judgment that it was part of the general arrangement that the ships of the same owner and the crews of the same owner should render mutual assistance to each other, and the real question seems to have been whether the services there rendered did go beyond that mutual assistance which, under the circumstances of the African trade, and according to the well-known usages of that trade, one ship was bound to render another. Dr. Lushington, after all, puts the case upon what appears to be the true principle, namely, whether the services rendered were services which, under their contract, the seamen were bound to perform, and for which they were remunerated by their wages.—p. 693.

SIR R. PHILLIMORE.—If in the case of silver or bullion any such exception as that referred to in The Emma existed in practice, some mention would have been made in the report of the case of The Jonge Bastiaan, either of such exception or of some authorities tending to support it; but the case, as reported, contains nothing to lead to the conclusion that specie salvaged is not in the same position as any other salvaged cargo. It appears to me that the Court would be involved in great difficulty if it admitted any other principle in salvage cases than that every description of property salvaged must, whatever be its nature, contribute equally in proportion to its value towards payment of the amount of salvage remuneration awarded.—p. 66.

LINDLEY, L.J.—It is true that the decisions of the Privy Council are not theoretically binding on this Court; but in cases of mercantile or Admiralty law, where the same principles are professedly followed in the colonies and in this country, it is, to say the least, highly undesirable that there should be any conflict between the decisions of the Judicial Committee and those of the High Court or Courts of Appeal in this country. Even if, therefore, I doubted the correctness of the decision in the case of The De Bay, I should be disposed to follow it rather than depart from it, and so introduce a diversity of practice where there ought to be no difference in the principle. But, in fact, the cases already referred to seem to me fully to warrant the decision in the case of The De Bay, and I do not regard it as introducing any new practice or principle. It must, however, always be borne in mind that the Court was dealing with a case in which the value of the property saved was very large compared with the whole sum awarded to the salvors, and that there was no circumstance to prevent the Court from awarding enough to cover the whole loss sustained by them. The conclusion to be drawn from these authorities is that where the property saved is ample in the sense already explained, and where there is no circumstance which the Court can see at once would prevent it from giving an amount of salvage sufficient to cover the loss sustained by the salvors, evidence has been received and ought to be received to show the amount of loss actually sustained by the owner of the salving ship by reason of the salving services, with a view to fix his remuneration at such a sum as will cover such loss and remunerate him for such further risk as he ought to be compensated for.—p. 207.

BUTT, J.—They (the plaintiffs) have paid into court the sum of 51*l.* 13*s.* 7*d.*, which they say is the ship's share, and they seek to avoid responsibility for the balance on the ground that it is payable by the cargo. That is not my opinion.
I think, as a matter of fact and of law, that when that agreement was come to, it was intended that the shipowners' liability and credit should be pledged. I think that is so in all cases of this sort, and I do not think that proposition is really affected by The Raisby. There the agreement was substantially this: "Tow me to port, and the amount of remuneration shall be settled by arbitration on shore." That is, all the parties interested were to go before the arbitrator.—

BUTT, J.—I am of opinion that where the captain of a ship reasonably and properly enters into such an arrangement for the salvage of his vessel, he binds the shipowners to pay the agreed amount. The cargo is on board the vessel, and the shipowners need not part with it until they have obtained security for any payments which they may have to make or have made in respect of it. . . . It is said that The Raisby is opposed to this view, but I am of opinion that it is inapplicable to the facts of the present case.
In The Raisby Sir James Hannen points out that the so-called agreement did not purport to extend the liability of the shipowners, and that it did not carry the matter further than if the captain of The Raisby had simply accepted the services of the salvaging ship. That shows the distinction between an agreement generally to tow or to save a ship, and one for a salvage service for a definite sum. Moreover, there are dicta in Anderson v. Ocean Steamship Co. (supra, col. 3382) in favour of the view I am now

BRUCE, J.—The practice of this Court in consolidating salvage actions has never been limited to cases where the rights of the various claimants depend entirely upon the same facts, or arise out of services of the same description, so much may clearly be gathered from the judgment in The William Hutt (supra, col. 3396) and from the judgment of Sir Robert Phillimore in The Melpomene. The matters which originally lead the Court to favour consolidation in salvage actions are considerations of convenience and economy.

The Dart (1899) 80 L. T. 23; 8 Asp. M. C. 481.

PHILLIMORE, J.—The real point in that case, [The Melpomene] is that The Resolute was engaged and she did her part towards performing her engagement, and that owing to the neglect of those on the salvaged vessel to make the rope fast she failed. The case comes in the same category as those where a salvor is employed, but the services were not primarily taken because those who required salvage assistance had got other salvors. The Resolute was the claimant in the case of The Melpomene, and was one of the tugs. The Melpomene's people were neglectful, therefore, The Resolute did her part, and it was not her fault if she contributed nothing to the ultimate safety. I prefer to put the case upon this ground which I think is the true one, and if that be so it falls entirely into line with the other cases.—p. 25.

BRUCE, J.—... At one time there was an inclination to relax the old practice of the Court, and not to insist upon consolidation when it was objected to by one or other of the parties. It was for a time considered that, by the exercise of its power to condemn in costs, a party who improperly refused to consent to consolidation, the Court would be able indirectly to prevent the parties being harassed by the unnecessary expense of double proceedings. This seems to have been the view expressed by Sir Robert Phillimore in The Jacob Landstrom. I am informed that the experience gained in the registry since 1878, has shown that very great difficulty is experienced in enforcing this rule as to costs; whilst in many cases the disallowance of costs after they have been incurred has been felt as a considerable hardship. I believe it to be much better to adhere to the old practice and to consolidate actions whenever it appears to be convenient to do so, without regard to the consent of the parties, and without holding out any threat as to costs which, in the absence of consolidation, must be incurred. The consent of the parties, which was all-important in the proceeding which is known as consolidation at common law, is not a governing fact in

JEUNE, P.—In The Scotia, and in The Dunstanborough, it is clear that, if a man had been on board he could have prevented the accident altogether; and further, in The Scotia, he could have prevented the consequences of it by beaching the barge.—p. 365.

SIR J. COLVILLE (for J.C.)—The respondent's counsel suggested that there is some difference of practice between the Court of Admiralty and the Courts of common law in that matter. Their lordships, however, cannot find that there is any such difference. They take the law as they find it laid down by Dr. Lushington in two cases. In the case of The Bolina, Dr. Lushington says:—"With regard to inevitable accident, the onus lies on those who bring a complaint against a vessel and who seek to be indemnified—on them is the onus of proving that the blame does attach upon the vessel proceeded against; the onus of proving inevitable accident does not necessarily attach to that vessel; it is only necessary when you show a prima facie case of negligence and want of due seamanship." Again, in The Virgil (supra, col. 3399), the same learned judge gives this definition of inevitable accident:—"In my apprehension an inevitable accident in point of law is this, viz., that which the party charged with the offence could not possibly prevent by the exercise of ordinary care, caution, and maritime skill. If a vessel charged with having occasioned a collision should be sailing at the rate of eight or nine miles an hour, when she ought to have proceeded only at the speed of three or four, it will be no valid excuse for the master to aver that he could not prevent the accident at the moment it occurred, if he could have used measures of precaution that would have rendered the accident less probable."—p. 219.

SIR R. PHILLIMORE.—There is no doubt a difficulty in applying the principles laid down in that judgment to all cases coming before the Court; but, as I infer from the judgment of the Privy Council, the true principle to be applied is this, that the party guilty of the infringement of the regulation has the burden cast upon him of showing that it could not possibly have contributed to the collision.

SIR JOHN JERVIS.—But it is further said that the damage confers no lien upon the ship, and a dictum of Dr. Lushington, in the case of The Volant, is cited as an authority for this proposition. By reference to a contemporaneous report of the same case (1 Notes of Cases 508), it seems doubtful whether the learned judge did use the expression attributed to him by Dr. W. Robinson. If he did, the expression is certainly inaccurate, and being a dictum merely not necessary for the decision of that case, cannot be taken as a binding authority.—p. 283.

to this, that he thought that, whatever might be the case at common law, by the maritime law of nations, charterers, to whom the government of the ship is voluntarily handed over, represent the owners so as to bind the ship in cases of collisions, and the generality of his remarks must be controlled by the particular circumstances of the case before him.—p. 53.

JESSEL, M.R.—Reference has been made to the case of The Bold Buccleugh from which I will read a few words of the judgment delivered by Sir John Jervis. At page 284, he says: "Having its origin in this rule of the civil law, a maritime lien is well defined by Lord Tenterden to mean a claim or privilege upon a thing to be carried into effect by legal process, and Mr. Justice Story (1 Sumner 78), explains that process to be a proceeding in rem, and adds that wherever a lien or claim is given upon the thing, then the Admiralty enforces it by a proceeding in rem, and indeed is the only competent Court to enforce it. A maritime lien is the foundation of the proceeding in rem, a process to make perfect a right inchoate from the moment the lien attaches, and whilst it must be admitted that where such a lien exists a proceeding in rem may be had, it will be found to be equally true that in all cases where a proceeding in rem is the proper course, there a maritime lien exists which gives a privilege or claim upon the thing to be carried into effect by legal process." Then he refers to what occurred in that case, and adds, that an action was brought in Scotland against the owners by name, very much like the action in the foreign Court below here; but there is something in addition, because when it comes within the jurisdiction they arrest the vessel to secure the debt, and then this applies exactly to this case, "the arrest by the steamer was only collateral to secure the debt." They did not get so far in Portugal. They tried but failed. Then he says: "We have already explained that in our judgment a proceeding in rem differs from one in personam, and it follows that the two suits being in their nature different, the pendency of the one cannot be pleaded in suspension of the other." That is, the formal proceedings in Scotland were against the person, although the vessel was arrested as security for the debt. It is really the form of the proceedings which must be looked at to ascertain whether it is a proceeding in rem or in personam, and it lends much greater force in the case before us when the attempt to arrest the vessel failed altogether. For this reason it seems to me we should go further than we should be warranted by any principle in going if we said that the judgment was not a personal judgment, and that the Court was entitled to order the arrest of the vessel as if it were an action in rem and a judgment in rem.—p. 113.

LORD BRAMWELL.—In The Bold Buccleugh it was assumed that a maritime lien existed in cases of collision within the body of a county, which could only be because it was given by 3 & 4 Vict. But two remarks are to be made on that case; one, that it was assumed without discussion; the other, that even if it was given it was in cases of collision; as I have said, it does not follow that it was so in the case of necessities.

ESHER, M.R.—The first point taken was that it was not sufficiently shown that the defendant was an independent sovereign power. . . . It was argued that the judge ought not to have been satisfied with that letter [a letter of the Secretary of State for the Colonies], but to have informed himself from historical and other sources as to the status of the Sultan of Johore. It was said that Sir R. Phillimore did so in The Charkieh. I know he did; but I am of opinion that he ought not to have done so; that when once there is an authoritative certificate of the Queen through her Minister of State as to the status of another Sovereign, that in the Courts of this country is decisive. Therefore this letter is conclusive that the defendant is an independent sovereign. For this purpose all sovereigns are equal. The independent sovereign of the smallest state stands on the same footing as the monarch of the greatest.

GORELL BARNES, J.—In The Parlement Belge, it was held that an unarmed packet belonging to the sovereign of a foreign state, and in the hands of officers commissioned by him and employed in carrying mails, is not liable to be seized in rem to recover redress for a collision, and that this immunity is not lost by reason of the packet's also carrying merchandise and passengers for hire. The decision was that the Courts cannot exercise jurisdiction over the person of any Sovereign or over the public property of any State which is destined to its public use, though such sovereign or property is within this country. A passage from the judgment of the M.R. was relied on in the argument before me.

JAMES, L.J.—Then, with regard to costs, the learned judge below did not deal with the costs as a matter in which he was exercising his judicial discretion. He was dealing with them as laying down the universal rule as established in The Milan, that wherever the owners of cargo succeed, they are entitled to the whole costs of the litigation. Now I cannot agree with that as a general rule. It seems to me that to do so would be to encourage unnecessary litigation.—p. 81.

Headnote.—The vessels C. and L. came into collision, in consequence of which salvage services were rendered to the C. The salvors brought a suit and recovered 50%. The L. was condemned in a suit for damages brought by the C., and on reference to the Registrar and Merchants as to the amount, they struck out the costs of the salvage suit incurred by the C., because her owners had made no tender to the salvors. On objection to their report, held that such costs are, by the practice of the Court, a proper item in the amount to be recovered in a suit for damage, and that there is no general principle laid down in Tindall v. Bell to induce the Court to depart from its usual practice.

HALSBURY, L.C.—The only difficulty I have had in this case has been in regard to the case in the Privy Council—The City of Peking, I think, with some labour, I have discovered the clue which guided the learned judges in coming to the conclusion that they did. . . . The principle of the decision, as I gather from that passage [15 App. Cas. at p. 447], is that the defendants had already paid for the use of it [The Melbourne] and for the use of the crew and for the navigation of it, and, therefore, if during that period when the defendants were actually called upon by the registrar's report to pay for the use of The Melbourne they had had to pay 95l. a day also for the detention of The Saghlian, it is very obvious that they would have been paying twice over, and therefore not unnaturally, I think, the Court came to the conclusion in that case, not as a principle of law at all, but as applicable to the particular facts of that case, that, to put in plain terms what I understand to be the effect of the judgment, you cannot have damages for that detention, because you have already got paid for the use of the substituted vessel in the form of the damages that the registrar has assessed. If that is the principle of the case, of course it is not inconsistent with, but, on the contrary on the same lines with the judgment which the Court of Appeal has given in the present case.—pp. 38, 39.

WILLES, J.—So far as applies to proceedings in the Court of Chancery under these acts, I may observe that, in Hill v. Andus, the bill does not appear to have been dismissed, though it seems as if Wood, V.-C., was ready to dismiss the bill, because there was no admission of liability. But the decision was simply that no injunction ought to be granted to restrain the trial of a particular cause. That is perfectly intelligible, because the Court of Chancery would have had no ordinary jurisdiction to try such a cause; but to treat it as a dismissal of the bill, and a refusal to interfere altogether, unless there was a general admission of liability in the first instance, would lead to the most serious consequences, because, except by means of the intervention of the Court of Chancery, there is no mode of arriving at the amount at which the limitation of liability is to be fixed, or of making the distribution of the amount when fixed. But whatever may be the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery with respect to such matters, it is not material in this case to define that jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, because the defendants have here first of all to establish the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty, before any difficulty has to be dealt with as to the mode by which that jurisdiction is to be enforced.—p. 187.

SIR R. PHILLIMORE.—Under the rule of restitutio in integrum the cargo-carrying vessel did not obtain interest from the date of the collision, because she received it in the shape of freight at the port of delivery. But where the amount of the liability is limited, and the sufferer does not receive full compensation, the reason which fixes the date of the probable arrival at the port of delivery as the date from which interest shall run does not apply. In the case of The Amalia Dr. Lushington remarked: "Upon what grounds then was interest given? Interest was not given by reason of indemnification for the loss, for the loss was the damage which had accrued; but interest was given for this reason, namely, that the loss was not paid at the proper time. If a man is kept out of his money it is a loss in the common sense of the word, but a loss of a totally different description, and clearly to be distinguished from a loss which has occurred by damage done at the moment of collision." This case was cited as an authority for the opposite opinion, but in truth it is not so; the judge in that case gave all that was prayed, and no decision on this point was involved in his judgment.—p. 13.

BLACKBURN, J.—With regard to The Northumbria, I at first thought it rightly decided, but I feel bound to say that Mr. Harrison's argument has shaken my opinion, and I have considerable doubt now whether the learned judge arrived at a correct conclusion. I had thought that when a suit was commenced money paid into Court in lieu of bail might well be regarded as "proceeds;" but, as Mr. Harrison pointed out, the money is simply paid in by way of security to pay the sum claimed in the particular suit. The difference is very material. Because if the ship were under arrest, or the proceeds of the ship, another claimant might attach them, but he could not attach a sum paid in lieu of bail to answer a particular claim. I therefore feel much doubt about that case, but I do not decide the question, because it is not necessary to do so.—p. 295.

JAMES, L.J.—First of all, with regard to the case of Burrell v. Simpson, which has been cited to us as decided by the Scotch Court—a Court of co-ordinate jurisdiction on the Act of Parliament in question, which Act applies to all parts of the United Kingdom—that case was also cited to the Court below, and upon it apparently the learned judge proceeded. When that case, however, is considered, it is really no authority, because the point which has been raised in this case as to the difference between a crew space between decks and one above the upper deck was never before the Court at all. It was no matter of argument before them, and was not referred to in any way in their judgment, and I should rather gather myself from the absence of all reference to it and from the nature of the ship that in point of fact the crew space there was a crew space which was clearly within the section of the original Act [sect. 21 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854], and that the only point really in dispute as to the tonnage was, whether in a steamship the gross tonnage was to be taken with or without the deduction for crew space in any event, that is, was it to be the total capacity of the ship or the register tonnage, with the addition of the amount of the deduction on account of engine-room? That seemed to me to be the only point there—that the gross tonnage on a steamer, whatever it is, would have been the same thing as the entire tonnage for registration had she been a sailing ship; that there was in reality no question before the Court as to the construction of the Act of Parliament.—p. 57.

BUTT, J.—On behalf of the defendants it was contended that in the case of The Franconia the Court of Appeal had in effect held that the owner of a foreign ship was not entitled to make these deductions (under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854), unless all the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1867, had been complied with. Having considered the case of The Franconia, I do not understand it to decide what was contended for by the defendants' counsel. It decided not that the German ship in that action was not entitled to deduct from the registered tonnage the spaces allotted to the crew which were inclosed, and which were above the upper deck, that being the deduction contemplated by the Act of 1854, but that she was not entitled to further deductions provided by the more recent Act of 1867, unless she had in all respects complied with the requirements of the Act.—p. 23.

LORD BRAMWELL.—In The Belcairn, what was really decided was that the judgment was a bar to any further claim being made, or to the same claim being made over again; that the judgment having been pronounced by the Court it was res judicata, and that the claim was gone. Of course, therefore, it could not be set up against the fund. That was the distinction between that case and this; there the claim had ceased to exist, here it has not.—p. 50.

SIR ROBERT COLLIER (for J.C.).—The question remains whether The Syria, though free from blame in fact, must nevertheless be held to blame by intendment of law. The decision of the learned judge upon this point appears to be based upon the principle shortly stated by Lord Kingsdown, in the passage which has been before cited as that in which The Cleadon was decided, viz., that the motor power was in the tug, the governing power in the ship towed. The judge of the Admiralty Court applying this principle to the present case held that The American and The Syria constituted one vessel in intendment of law. This is no doubt an accurate representation of the relations usually subsisting in this country between the tug and the tow.—p. 132. . . . The master of The American appears to have undertaken to tow The Syria under circumstances quite exceptional. Their lordships collect that he determined to take home The Syria partly because he thought it his duty to his employers, who owned both vessels, partly with a view to obtain salvage from the owners of The Syria's cargo

(which he succeeded in doing). There is no evidence of his having been hired by the captain of The Syria, or having acted in any way under the captain of The Syria's control. On the contrary, it would appear that the governing power was wholly with The American. Under these circumstances their lordships are of opinion that the principle on which The Cleadon was decided does not apply to this case.—p. 133.

the owners must show that at the time the vessel was proceeding to sea. They must also show that the act was exclusively that of the pilot. In Bennet v. Moita it was held that where a pilot is on board an injury occasioned by negligence in the navigation of the vessel prima facie is attributable to the pilot, and that he, and not the owner, is responsible for it, but this doctrine was overruled by a case before the Privy Council of *Hammond v. SIR MONTAGUE E. SMITH (for the Court).—The relative duties of the crew and pilot were discussed in two cases, which are to be found in the 7th Moore. The first is The Christiansa. In that case Mr. Baron Parke, in giving the judgment of the committee, says, "The duties of the master and the pilot are in many respects clearly defined. Although the pilot has charge of the ship, the owners are most clearly responsible to third persons for the sufficiencies of the ship and her equipments, the competency of the master and crew, and their obedience to the orders of the pilot in everything that concerns his duty, and, under ordinary circumstances, we think that his commands are to be implicitly obeyed. To him belongs the whole conduct of the navigation of the ship, to the safety of which it is important that the chief direction should be vested in one only . . . The pilot had unquestionably the sole direction of the vessel in those respects where his local knowledge is presumably required. The direction, the course, the manœuvres of the vessel when sailing belong to him, and the Trinity Masters, therefore, rightly decided that the neglect to set the staysail and jib, after The Christiansa was driven from her anchorage, was the fault of the pilot alone. It was also his sole duty to select the proper anchorage place, and mode of anchoring, and preparing for anchoring, as was held to be clear in the case of The Gipsy King (supra, col. 3426)." And in The Lochlibo (infra, col. 3429), Lord Kingsdown in giving the judgment of the committee in that case, it being a question whether the vessel ought to have sailed through the Downs, says: "It was contended at the bar that in this case the impropriety of sailing through the Downs was so manifest that the captain ought to have refused, in spite of the pilot's opinion, to permit the ship to proceed, but we cannot assent to this. It would be very dangerous to hold that there can be any divided authority in the ship with reference to the same subject; and whether the ship was to anchor or to proceed was a matter which we think belonged exclusively to the pilot to decide."—p. 459.

HANNEN, P.—Thus the question remains whether the part played by the captain was such an interference with the pilot as to take away the responsibility. It was pointed out by Dr. Lushington in the The Lochlibo that a suggestion made to the pilot does not take away the responsibility from him. It rests with the pilot to form an opinion in regard to the captain's suggestion, and it is only when the captain gives an order contrary to that of the pilot that he takes the responsibility for the manoeuvres on himself and removes it from the pilot.—p. 36.

LORD CHELMSFORD.—There has been some little confusion in the cases as to the onus probandi. In the case of The Iona, which was relied upon in the judgment of the Court below, and mentioned in the argument at the bar, Kindersley, V.-C., is reported to have said: "It is not enough for the owners to prove that there was fault or negligence in the pilot: they must prove to the satisfaction of the Court which has to try the question that there was no default whatever on the part of the officers and crew of their vessel, or any of them, which might have been in any way conducive to the damage." The learned Vice-Chancellor imposes on the owners a sort of negative proof which it is impossible for them to give. If, instead of saying, "They must prove that there was no default," he had said, "It must be proved that there was no fault on the part of the officers and crew," he would have been perfectly correct. The condition of exemption that the owners should prove that the accident arose entirely from the fault of the pilot, is one which must be fairly and reasonably interpreted. The owners having proved fault on the part of the pilot sufficient to cause, and in fact causing the calamity, must, therefore, in the absence of proof of contributory fault of the crew, be held to have satisfied the condition on which exemption depends, and are not to be called on to adduce proof of a negative character, to exclude the mere possibility of contributory default. It may be that in the course of the evidence of the owners to fix the responsibility solely upon the pilot, certain acts or omissions on the part of the crew may come out, and it will then be incumbent on the owners to show satisfactorily that those acts or omissions in no degree contributed to the accident.—p. 379.

ESHER, M.R.—Clyde Navigation Co. v. Barclay comes to this, that where there is a prima facie case made out by the plaintiff, and the answer is compulsory pilotage, and where the defendant gives evidence which prima facie proves that the accident was solely the fault of the pilot, the plaintiff cannot require the defendant to go on to prove that he, the defendant, was not guilty of some negligence contributing to the accident. The burden is then upon the plaintiff to give some evidence of such contributory negligence.

That case does not interfere with the doctrine, which has been so long acted upon, as to what the defendant must prove in such a case.—pp. 89, 90.

BYLES, J. (for the Court).—Our judgment does not conflict with the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the case of The Stettin; for in that case the pilot appears originally to have been taken on board where and when by law there was no necessity to take him. It would be superfluous for us to express any opinion on the case of Lucey v. Ingram, or its applicability to the case now under consideration.—p. 247.

LORD ROMILLY.—Accordingly, contrasting the extended exoneration in 6 Geo. 4. c. 125, s. 55, with the more limited exoneration in 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 388, and the policy suggested by Parke, B., as the ground of the former, with that suggested by Byles, J., in General Steam Navigation Co. v. British Colonial Steam Navigation Co. (supra, col. 3427), with reference to the latter, their lordships are of opinion that the true interpretation of the enactment by which the present case is governed depends on this, whether the employment of the pilot was compulsory, and that it cannot be affected by anything decided in Lucey v. Ingram, and that the authority or soundness of the decision in The Stettin is not in any way prejudiced by the omission to notice the case of Lucey v. Ingram.

GORELL BARNES, J.—Although it is stated in the judgment of the learned judges who decided that case [The Johann Sverdrup] that the effect of sect. 16 of the said order was to abolish compulsory pilotage in the Tyne, they were not dealing with the case of a vessel carrying passengers between ports in the British islands. . . . It was held that the [Tyne Pilotage Officer Confirmation] Act of 1865 superseded the pilotage provisions of the Act of 1801, and that no obligation to employ a pilot was imposed by the said 16th section upon any vessel, whether British or foreign. It will be seen that no question was raised or considered as to the effect of sect. 354 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, for which sect. 604 of the Act of 1894 is now substituted. The order of 1865 was made under the powers conferred by sect. 39 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1862 (replaced by certain sections of the Act of 1894), and confirmed by the Act of 1865, and, although it superseded the local Act of 1801, and substituted new regulations for those contained in that Act, there is nothing in it inconsistent with sect. 354 of the Act of 1854 or sect. 604 of the Act of 1894 [by which pilotage is made compulsory upon vessels carrying passengers between ports in the British islands].—p. 52.

BRETT, M.R.—In The Libra, the rule [No. 23, Thames Rules] had to be applied to a vessel which sighted the other in the reach, while above the point, and before she began to round; it is now argued that the rule does not apply to the present case, since it is said that in The Libra this Court intimated that the rule would not apply to a vessel already on the point. But that is not the effect of the decision in The Libra. I think that the rule applies though the vessel is off, or more correctly speaking on, the point when she first ought to have seen the other vessel. Clearly, if the vessel is not already on or off the point, she ought, so far as she can, not to go on to the point until the other vessel comes round and is clear. But if she is already on the point what is she to do? In my opinion, she ought to remain as nearly as she can in the same place with respect to her course up and down the river.—p. 49.

JAMES, L.J. (for the Court).—It was suggested to us that the decision of the Privy Council in The Velocity had established that the rule as to crossing ships did not apply to the river Thames. It is difficult to conceive how a decision of the Privy Council on the general maritime rules in 1869, could be held so to nullify an express provision in the local legislation promulgated in the year 1872, specially and exclusively for the regulation of the navigation of the Thames itself. It may be convenient further to notice that there seems to be a great misapprehension, induced probably by the marginal or headnote of the case, as to what was really decided by that case . . . all that was really decided was, that in the particular part of the Thames, and under the particular circumstances which the Court had to deal with in that case, a vessel was not by that rule exonerated from the consequences of her omission to do what good seamanship required her to do. And this is made quite clear in the subsequent case of The Ranger (infra).—p. 64.

[Definition of BRETT, L.J.—Can we then form a definition of the difference between crossing ships and overtaking ships? It seems to me that this may be a very good definition . . . that if the ships are in such a position, and are on such courses, and at such distances, that if it were night the hinder ship could not see any part of the side lights of the forward ship, then they cannot be said to be crossing ships, although their courses may not be exactly parallel. It would not do. I think, to limit the angle of the crossing too much, but a limit to that extent, it seems to me, is a very useful and practical rule. And then, if the hinder of the two ships is going faster than the other, she is an overtaking ship.]

JAMES, L.J.—I also desire to add that the result of the argument induces me to come to the conclusion that I doubt whether the definition laid down in The Franconia can be laid down as a rule to be so generally applicable as appears to have been intimated in that case.—p. 17.

ESHER, M.R.—During the hearing of this case much has been said in regard to the case of The Dordogne, and the construction of Art. 13. In that case the construction of that article was discussed, and the question arose whether "moderate" was to be considered an absolute term, or relative according to the circumstances. It was there held that "moderate" did not mean moderate speed absolutely, but that moderate speed meant moderate according to circumstances, so that what is moderate speed at one time is not moderate at another. We did not attempt to lay down any specific distance in any case, or say that if two vessels were within a mile of each other, or a mile and a-half, the article was to be interpreted according to that fact. I illustrated that rule by the example of a vessel going up or down a narrow river, where she would know she ought to have only just enough way on her to keep her steerage way. I also mentioned the case of a vessel on the open sea, but in the track of ships, in a fog, when she should go very slowly, though not so slowly as if she were in a narrow river.—p 26.

SIR FRANCIS JEUNE.—But vessels may no doubt be crossing vessels within Art. 22 in a river. It depends on their presumable courses. . . . The question, therefore, always turns on the reasonable inference to be drawn as to a vessel's future course from her position at a particular moment, and this greatly depends on the nature of the locality where she is at that moment. . . . It was reasonable for those on The Pekin, as without fault on their part, they did not hear the double blast of The Normandie before they took action with their helm, to assume that The Normandie would take the outside channel, in which case their courses would not cross, or would take the southern side of the inside channel, in which case their courses would indeed cross, but not so as to involve risk of collision. The above considerations show the distinction between the present case and that of The Leverington, which was relied on by the appellants. In that case the vessels were held by the Court of Appeal to be, as they unquestionably were, crossing vessels within the meaning of Art. 22.—p. 98.

SIR JAMES COLVILLE.—Their lordships desire to remark that, though the principle involved in the case of The Commerce may be in itself a sound one, it is one which should be applied very cautiously, and only where the circumstances are clearly exceptional. They conceive that to leave to masters of vessels a discretion as to obeying or departing from the sailing rules is dangerous to the public, and that to require them to exercise such discretion, except in a very clear case of necessity, is hard upon the masters themselves, inasmuch as the slightest departure from these rules is almost invariably relied upon as constituting a case of at least contributory negligence.—p. 672.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—The construction put upon the rule—[by-law 20 of the Bye-laws for the Regulation of the River Tyne, 1884] in The Harvest seems to be this: The incoming vessel is not to come so near as not to leave room for vessels going out of the river and if she is coming from the southward before she turns in, she must leave a fairway for all vessels going out of the port. Therefore, it is not a rule to be measured with compasses on the chart. It is a practical rule. The incoming ship must give room enough. She must not run up so close as only to leave just room.—p. 48.

LORD BLACKBURN.—If the question now raised had been that which the Court of Queen's Bench, of which I was then a member, treated as raised in Smith v. Brown—that really was a case under Lord Campbell's Act, and under Lord Campbell's Act only, but was treated as general—if the question now raised had been whether personal damage to a man who lived was within that 7th section of the enactment, I should have had, as I then had, some doubt about the matter, and it would have carried me so far that if that had been the question now raised, I certainly should have wished to hear the case argued out to the end before giving an opinion upon it one way or the other. But the question raised here being exclusively whether the liability of a ship-owner as a person, under Lord Campbell's Act, to make good damages for the negligence of his servant who happens to be the master of the ship, comes within the words "damage done by any ship," I decidedly say I do not think it does.—p. 72.

The Court then proceeded to dissent from The Franconia.]

BOWEN, L.J.—I am confident that there is no right of action under Lord Campbell's Act in the Admiralty Division, and I agree with the judgments of Lord Bramwell and the M.R., delivered in The Franconia.—p. 100.

HERSCHELL, L.C.—I think it will be convenient in the first place, to consider whether the proposition which formed the basis of Dr. Lushington's judgment in The Robert Pow, that cases of damage by collision (by which, as I have said, I think he meant collision between two ships) were alone within the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty at the time the statute of 1840 became law can be maintained.

I may observe at the outset that it is difficult to understand if "damage" had, as suggested, a well understood meaning sufficient to authorise or indeed render necessary a restriction of the words "damage received" in sect. 6 of the Act of 1840, why a similar restriction of the words "damage done" in the Act of 1861 was not equally requisite. As I have already pointed out the learned judge did in his judgment in The Robert Pow, state that the same restriction ought to be applied in construing both statutes; but as regards the statute of 1861 he afterwards deliberately receded from this position.

The Sarah was decided by the same learned judge in the year previous to the decision of The Robert Pow, and the law laid down was certainly very different. . . . It seems to me impossible to reconcile. . . . the decision in this case with the ratio decidendi in The Robert Pow, for it is difficult to see why, if the Court had inherent jurisdiction to deal with damage caused to a ship through its coming into contact with a keel, damage resulting to a ship from its being forced into contact with the ground, should be outside its jurisdiction.

It is said that in The Ida, decided in 1860—two years before The Sarah—Dr. Lushington stated the law very differently. . . . Dr. Lushington in the course of his judgment said: "The Court it must be remembered, has never exercised a general jurisdiction over damage, but over causes of collision only, and this is no collision in the proper sense of the term." If I am to estimate the relative weight of these conflicting statements of the law, it seems to me that the view expressed in the later case of The Sarah is more important and authoritative. . . .

When I turn to prior authorities. . . . I can find no authority which supports the limitation of the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty laid down in The Ida and The Robert Pow.—pp. 22, 23.

SIR R. PHILLIMORE.—It is true that the practice of the Admiralty Court has been to call upon the defendants to begin in cases where no charge of negligence is made against the plaintiff, and the only defence raised upon the pleadings is inevitable accident; but I think,
 after the recent decision of the Judicial Com-

BRETT, M.R.—The Court of Admiralty always had jurisdiction over the costs of an action; and even if it had not, the jurisdiction has now been given by the Judicature Acts, and Order 45 has affirmed the discretion which the Court of Admiralty always had. . . . Therefore, with all deference to that eminent judge Dr. Lushington, I think that the moment he laid down the rule that where on a reference the plaintiff did not succeed in obtaining a certain proportion of his claim he was to be deprived of, or even have to pay, costs, he did what he had no legal power to do, and thereby fettered not only his own discretion, but that also of his successors. I doubt whether the rule which has been referred to is a good rule, and whether it would not in many cases work a good deal of injustice.

HALSBURY, L.C.—I cannot entertain a doubt, when I look at the form of the statement of claim as it originally stood, that the cause of action was originally founded upon the notion that this vessel was invited to a berth, in the strict and proper sense of that word, at which it was unfit for a vessel under any circumstances to lie, and that, by reason of the inequality and unfitness of the berth, the vessel being brought there was strained and injured. If that had been the complexion of the case, I certainly entertain no doubt that the law as laid down in the earlier cases and in the later case of The Moorcock would have been applicable to that state of things. . . . the contention is that this obligation exists, and that, to put it plainly, there was a hard substance left in front of their berth which ought to have been cleared away, and that by reason of its not having been cleared away this accident happened. With regard to that, which is in plain terms the contention which has been made, all I shall say upon that part of the case is that I do not know whether that is so or not, but one difficulty is that there is no evidence.—pp. 29, 31.

[In the C. A. the case was not specifically mentioned in the judgments, but the decision of

[Lord Cairns did not concur in the reasoning of the Court of Appeal, but thought their conclusion right. Lord Hatherley could not concur in the reasons of the Court of Appeal; nor, otherwise than with extreme doubt, in the opinion of Lord Cairns: Lord O'Hagan's reasoning was not precisely that of the Court of Appeal, though he supported their conclusion. He held Dennis v. Tovell inapplicable. Lord Blackburn dissented from Dennis v. Tovell, and affirmed the judgment of the Court of Appeal with great doubt and hesitation. Lord Gordon dissented from the majority.]

COCKBURN, C.J.—We are aware that in holding that the Court of Admiralty has not acquired jurisdiction in cases within the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 93, we are taking upon ourselves to overrule cases decided by very high authority. In the case of The Sylph (supra), the present judge of the Admiralty Court held that a diver who had been caught by the paddle-wheel of a steamer, and had suffered personal injury, might maintain a suit in that Court. In the subsequent case of The Guldfaxe (supra), the same learned judge held—though, as he himself declared, “not without doubt and hesitation”—that a claim arising on Lord Campbell’s Act was within the jurisdiction of the Court. In the still later case of The Beta, the plaintiff having brought his suit in the Court of Admiralty, in respect of personal injuries sustained through a collision between a ship on board of which he was serving and the defendants’ vessel, the defendants excepted to the jurisdiction; and the judge having rejected their petition, and the case having been brought before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council on appeal, that Court, without even calling on the counsel for the respondents, dismissed the appeal with costs. We have, of course, felt greatly pressed by the weight of the decision of a Court of such high authority; but we have been unable to bring ourselves to adopt the same view. The grounds of the decision, which appear to us to have been arrived at somewhat hastily, are very briefly given in the report of the case: and the difficulties which have stood in our way of taking the same view of the effect of the 7th section of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 93, and which have led us to an opposite conclusion, do not appear to have been present to the minds of the members of the Committee who took part in the decision . . . after having given the case our best consideration, we arrive at the conclusion that the legislature, in omitting all reference to loss of life or personal injury, such as is to be found in the Merchant Shipping Acts, cannot properly be taken to have intended to give jurisdiction in respect of such matters by the use of the term “damage,” and thereby materially to alter the rights accruing under Lord Campbell’s Act, we feel bound, notwithstanding the weight of the authority we have referred to, to give effect to our opinion by giving judgment for the plaintiffs in prohibition.—p. 736.

The Beta, questioned.

BRETT, J. (for the Court).—Again, the case of The Sylph (supra), affirmed on appeal by the Privy Council in The Beta, in which it was held, that a claim for compensation for personal injuries caused by negligent management of a ship might be maintained by a suit in rem in the Admiralty Court against the ship by virtue of the words, “The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim for damage done by any ship,” which are contained in sect. 7 of 24 Vict. c. 10, and the case of The Guldfaxe (supra) would be, if unimpeached, authorities to a great extent against the conclusion of which we in this case arrive. But these cases have been seriously impeached by the case of Smith v. Brown (supra, col. 3441), in the decision and reasoning and observations of which we entirely concur.—p. 299.

SIR MONTAGUE SMITH (for the Court).—Their lordships have felt that the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, in Simpson v. Blues is entitled to great consideration from the authority due to the Court and the force with which the reasons for the decision are stated, and they would have been glad to have been able to rest upon it. The Queen's ordinary Courts of Law, which hold the power of prohibition, must in the end decide questions of jurisdiction; and when their opinion has been fully declared, it must and ought to be acquiesced in: but if, when the question has been brought before them on appeal, their lordships now yielded to the decision of the Common Pleas, they would in effect, conclude an important question of jurisdiction in a manner contrary to the opinion of the judge of the High Court of Admiralty—and as at present advised, their own—upon the authority of the judgment of one only of the Common Law Courts, pronounced on a summary application from which there was no appeal. They think, before this conclusion is reached, an opportunity should be given for further consideration of the statute.—p. 154.

BRAMWELL, B.—But what they are claiming they claim as of right, and not as a matter dependent on the opinion of any superior Court as to where the action should be brought. This being my view, and it being always a matter in which the difficulty might be obviated by leave being granted to sue in the superior courts (which, I think no judge would ever refuse), and it being in the power of the legislature to state what was or is its intention, the subject is perhaps not worth much discussion, with all respect be it said, to the two great authorities who have differed. But if we are to choose between them, it seems to me that the Court of Common Pleas was right. The difficulties in the way of the Privy Council are most forcibly put in their judgment: to those are added most cogent arguments in the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas against the expediency of giving Admiralty jurisdiction in such cases as those in question, either to the High Court of Admiralty or the County Court. Shortly, the objections are, that on the construction contended for by the defendants, the County Court has Admiralty jurisdiction in cases in which the Admiralty Court has no original jurisdiction; that the High Court would have an appellate jurisdiction when it has not original jurisdiction; that there could be transferred to it from the County Court cases which it could not originally entertain, and so it could hear and decide cases not properly within its own jurisdiction or that of the County Court. To these objections are to be added, not as aiding the construction of the statute, but as helping to the probable intention of the legislature, the objections, so forcibly stated in the judgment of the Common Pleas, to Admiralty procedure being applied to such cases as those in question. These different considerations were felt so strongly by the Privy Council, that they would perhaps have decided as the Common Pleas did, but for the necessity of finding an application for words, for which they saw none if the Common Pleas were right. With great respect, it seems to me that a meaning may be given to the words, without the admittedly preposterous consequences the defendants contend for.—p. 73.

JESSEL, M.R.—In the case of Simpson v. Blues (supra, col. 3457), where there were four judges, Willes, Byles, Brett and Grove, JJ., no one alleged, although something of that kind had fallen from Willes, J., on a previous occasion, that the words [of sect. 2 of 31 & 35 Vict. c. 71] were anything but clear in themselves, and the ground of the decision was totally different. In the case of the Privy Council, again (The Cargo ex Argos), we have four ordinary judges of the Privy Council, and all four agreed that the words were clear. Then when the case came again before a common law Court in Gunnestad v. Price, there were only two judges present, Baron Cleasby and Baron Bramwell. Baron Cleasby does not state the words to be otherwise than clear in themselves, but I admit that Baron Bramwell does, and he says that he considers them ambiguous. Whether or not they are ambiguous is a question, of course, not to be lightly passed over with the opinion of Baron Bramwell the other way, and, therefore, I wish to say a word or two on the grounds which induced him to think them ambiguous.—(p. 231)

[The Master of the Rolls then discusses Baron Bramwell's judgment at great length.] Now, with the greatest possible respect for Lord Justice Bramwell—and no one entertains a greater respect for him than I do—it shows how these different consequences strike different minds. Not only do they not appear to me to be either absurd or preposterous, but I cannot see any objection to them at all. I cannot see any objection on the ground that the Appeal Court has no original jurisdiction over the same subject-matter: I cannot see any objection on the ground that the County Court should have Admiralty jurisdiction where the Court of Admiralty has no jurisdiction; nor can I see any objection on the ground which is the third and only one remaining, that the Court of Admiralty should transfer to itself especially difficult causes relating to maritime matters, though the Court itself had no original jurisdiction to deal with such a cause. That being my opinion, it appears to me that there is no absurdity and nothing preposterous in these consequences to induce us to overrule or control the plain meaning of the Act of Parliament. It does, therefore, lead me to the conclusion that the decision of the Privy Council is the correct decision.—p. 236.

MANISTY, J. The Court of Appeal followed and adopted the decision of the Privy Council in the cases of Cargo ex Argos (supra) and The Helwons (L. R. 5 P. D. 134), decided in 1872. These decisions have reference to the construction of the Act of 1869, and do not touch the present question, which depends upon the construction of the Act of 1868. The Douce (supra, col. 3456) is in point as to the construction of the Act of 1868, and we should probably have felt bound to follow it, even if we had doubted its correctness, but we do not entertain any such doubt.—p. 167.

SELBORNE, L.C.—With regard to Alcock v. Cooke, it is a case which may be perfectly correct in the principles which it lays down; but it is a very singular fact, that, if there ever was a case in which the Court went out of its way to lay down principles which were not needful for the decision of the particular matter before it, it was the case of Alcock v. Cooke; because there the question was whether wreck could be claimed by the owner of a property called Sutton, which was alleged to be part of a manor named Greet-ham, which manor was within property of the Duchy of Lancaster. Wreck was not mentioned in the grant, and the Court, upon looking at Domesday Book, are stated in the report, page 346, to have been of opinion that Sutton was not within the manor. One would have thought that the whole foundation of the case would then have disappeared; nevertheless the Court went on to express its opinion as to what the state of the case would have been if wreck had been granted by the grant under which the party claimed; and it is said that inasmuch as this was clearly proved that at the date of the grant wreck was outstanding, so to say, leased as belonging to a larger property to another person who was in possession under the lease, which was for a term of years, such a grant of what was not at the time in the possession of the Crown would have been void. Well, I am not at all concerned to enter upon the question whether that was so or not. I only observe that that has no bearing upon the present case.—p. 940.

SIR R. PHILLIMORE.—The attention of the Court (in this case) does not seem to have been drawn to the previous case of The Onni (supra), nor to the 24 Vict. c. 10, which had been passed in the month preceding the decision in The Comtesse de Fregeville, to which it seems to me very important to advert. The 4th section of that statute gives the Court a jurisdiction over "claims for building, equipping, or repairing any ship," claims which would answer to those of the old material man, as known in this Court before the decision in The Neptune (supra, col. 3463). The 5th section of the same statute gives the Court a distinct jurisdiction over "any claim for necessities supplied to any ship" in certain cases. Since this statute, in The Bonne Amélie (infra), in 1865, it was decided that the travelling expenses of an agent to attend a trial in a case of collision were not necessities; and in The Aaltze Willemina (infra), in 1866, the Court refused to consider money advanced to a master to pay average necessities. In both these cases, however, and in other former cases, the Court seems to have considered that money advanced for the purchase of necessities stood on the same footing as necessities.—p. 521.

FRY, L.J. (for the Court).—In 1871, in The Two Ellens (infra, col. 3467), Sir R. Phillimore had to determine whether, as the law was then and is now, the material man has a maritime lien upon a British ship under the statute of 1861; and after reviewing several of the decisions of Dr. Lushington, he expressed his inability to acquiesce in the reasoning on which the judgment in The Pacific (infra, col. 3466) was founded, or to reconcile that reasoning with the judgment in The Ella A. Clark. "The two statutes ought," he said, "I should have ventured to think, to be constructed as being in pari materia." He further said that he should have thought that, in the case of material men, there was an inchoate lien before the institution of the suit, but nevertheless he determined to follow Dr. Lushington in the case of The Pacific, and held that there was no such lien. The case was naturally carried to the P. C., when the decision of the Court below, to the effect that no maritime lien was created by the statute of 1861 against a British ship, was upheld.—p. 59.

The result of this long catena of authorities is hardly satisfactory; it shows that for several years Dr. Lushington repelled the notion that the statutes of 1840 created any maritime lien in favour of the material man; it shows that in one or more cases he admitted the opposite view, but that at a yet later date he reverted to the earlier conclusion; and that in the one case, that of The Ella A. Clark, in which he formally decided in favour of the lien, he did so on a principle of construction, namely, that when the legislature gave a proceeding in rem, then it created a maritime lien, and that this principle was rejected by the learned judge himself in the next case of The Pacific, and by the P. C. in the case of The Two Ellens.

In our opinion the two statutes of 1840 and 1861 ought (notwithstanding the observations of Mellish, L.J., in The Two Ellens) to be construed as in pari materia, and we think that the decision of the P. C. in that case lends confirmation to the conclusion at which we arrive, namely, that whilst the statute of 1840 has enabled the material man to enforce his claim in the Admiralty Court, and as one means has given him a right to arrest the ship, it has given him no maritime lien, and consequently no right against the ship till action brought.—p. 60.

The Ella A. Clark, overruled.

DR. LUSHINGTON.—I think I am bound to notice the case of The Skipwith, as reported, and I have no reason to say not correctly reported. It may be that in that case some of the observations made by me, either really or apparently, are not reconcilable with this judgment. The observations may have been correctly reported, but erroneously applied to the facts of the case, as I am now able to ascertain them. I regret that the case of The Skipwith was not brought before the Court in a more formal shape, and that it was not more maturely considered; but, if I was in error in that case, assuredly I would never for a mere nominal consistency persist in it.—p. 1111.

CHITTY, J.—Then the defendants refer to the cases of The Mali Ivo, The Caterina Chiazzare (infra), and The Delta (infra). From these cases it will be found that the proposition the defendant relied on was a dictum of Sir R. Phillimore's, before whom all these cases came. But these actions were actions in rem, and there were proceedings in rem in a foreign country. And the proposition on the part of Sir R. Phillimore, though he did not act upon it in any of the cases, was not simply that the Court would stay proceedings, but that there would be a case upon which to put the plaintiffs to their election. I think, as far as I am concerned, these observations of his may be disposed of by the remark, that the actions were actions in rem, and obviously it would be inconvenient to have two Courts deciding finally and conclusively as is the case when the proceedings are in rem with reference to the same subject-matter.—p. 205.

GORELL BARNES, J.—[After stating the effect of The Christiansborg continued:] The present case appears to me totally different from any preceding case. No foreign legal proceedings have in this case been instituted by the plaintiffs against the defendants. The defendants' ship never arrested at all, but this guarantee, which forms the basis of the defendants' application, was signed by the agents of the defendant ship declaring their willingness "to give bail on behalf of the captain of the Mannheim for payment of 50,000 guilders, with interest and expenses, for which the captain of the Mannheim might be condemned in virtue of sentence given by the competent authority for the indemnity of damages sustained by the captain of the Salisbury"—which really means the plaintiffs—"through the collision of the steamer." Their domicile is declared to be at the office of the party in Holland. In accepting that guarantee it seems to me that the plaintiffs have done nothing to debar themselves from arresting this ship.—p. 7.

SIR R. PHILLIMORE.—I have no note of my judgment in The Doctor Van Thunnen Tellow, but I am represented as having said, "The enactment [County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868] is badly drawn. In my opinion, the 31st section must be held to apply to appeals where an amount has been decreed to be due, that is, to appeals by defendants only." It is clear that that is an extra-judicial dictum, and not necessary for the decision of that case. In the case of The Elizabeth, the Court certainly decided that it was competent to the plaintiffs or the defendants to appeal. Now, I think, that neither of these decisions can be considered as governing the case before me, because the circumstance of the plaintiff, who is the appellant, having instituted his action for an amount less than 50*l.* is not one which seems to me to be decided by either of these judgments.

KENNEDY, J.—In that case the policy sued on contained the p.p.i. clause. In a note in the report it is stated that my brother Bigham after consultation with Mathew, J., intimated that he would, with the consent of the parties, hear the case as if the policy did not contain the p.p.i. clause. . . . But what I am invited to do here is something quite different from that which was asked by the parties and permitted by my brother Bigham in that case. That was, in effect, to treat the vitiating clause as deleted. What I am invited to do is to treat the policy as valid with the vitiating clause retained as part of it. If that were done here which the Court did in Buchanan v. Faber, if I dealt with this policy as if it contained no p.p.i. clause, the plaintiffs, so far from being helped, would obviously be involved in a fatal difficulty. They admittedly never had any insurable interest; the absence of such an interest has been pleaded by the defendants; and the only possible reply to this defence lies in the presence in the policy of the p.p.i. clause. If that is treated as gone, the plaintiff's case goes with it.

BLACKBURN, J. (for the Court).—The non-disclosure of a fact, after the policy was made in equity, could have no more effect than a similar non-disclosure after it was made in law. The present is an intermediate case, and the question which must now be determined seems to us to be whether, after the negotiation is complete and the contract made, in fact and in good faith, and the underwriter is under a moral obligation to execute a formal policy, the assured is bound by good faith to give information to the assurer of a matter which would make him aware that his bargain was a bad one, information which ought to have no effect on him, but would expose him to a temptation to break his contract, which as far as the law is concerned, he may do with impunity, because for fiscal purposes the legislature has forbidden the Court, either of law or equity, to enforce the contract. To the question thus stated the answer seems obvious, that he is not bound to lead his neighbour into temptation. Until lately, no question of this sort could be raised in any Court, for the rules of evidence required that the contract, being written, should be proved by the production of the writing, the slip; and Lord Ellenborough, in Warwick v. Slade (3 Camp. 127), accurately expressed the effect of the statutes then in force, when he said, "The revenue laws forbid me to look to what is called the slip;" and such continued to be the law down to and after the time when Xenos v. Wickham (supra), was argued in the House of Lords; and the judges who (on the 8th May, 1867) gave their opinions, in the House of Lords, used language showing that they thought that the law was as stated by Lord Ellenborough; and so it was. These passages were quoted and relied on in the argument before us. But in that very year, on the 31st May, 1867, the 30 Vict. c. 23, received the royal assent. This statute was not brought to the notice of James, V.-C., in Mackenzie v. Coulson, according to the construction put upon it by this Court in Ionides v. Pacific Insurance Co. (post, col. 3507); that Act completely changed the law, and repealed all those Acts which had ordered that the slip was not so much as to be looked at in a Court of justice, putting it on a footing very similar to that of an unsigned memorandum of a contract within the Statute of Frauds, or a lease for more than for three years not under seal viz., that it was void and not enforceable at law or in equity, but might be given in evidence wherever, though not valid, it was material. It is open to the defendant in a Court of Error to question the accuracy of the reasoning on which the judgment in Ionides v. Pacific Insurance Co. proceeded, but we think that while it stands unreversed it leads irresistibly to the conclusion that the judgment in the present case should be for the plaintiffs.—p. 309.

LUSH, J. (for the Court).—The real ground of the decision in Sanderson v. Symonds was that the defendant was not, and could not, be prejudiced by the alteration. Why the Court should have limited the doctrine there laid down to policies of insurance, it is not easy to understand. We cannot discover any reason for making a distinction between that and any other species of contract.

HEATH, J.—With respect to the case of Sparrow v. Caruthers, I think it ought not to be extended: it was only a visi prius decision, it has been cited several times but never recognised, and whenever it has been cited great pains have been taken to distinguish it from the cases before the Court, though perhaps not always with success. I do not mean, however, to quarrel with that decision: a case precisely similar is not likely to arise again, since it is not customary for the owners of goods, to send their own lighters, but always to employ public lighters.—p. 435.

KELLY, C.B.—It is said that the interest only attaches on a policy like this, that the risk only attaches when the voyage on which the freight is to be earned has commenced; and it is insisted that the risk here could not commence before the cargo was discharged. If that argument be correct, it amounts to this, that there never can be an effective insurance on freight to be earned on a voyage from a given port, until the ship is in a condition to receive goods on board. But we find a long series of cases, beginning with Thompson v. Taylor, and coming down to the recent case of Barber v. Fleming (infra, col. 3480), which conclusively establish the contrary. The real doctrine is this: if the voyage, by means of which the chartered freight is to be earned has commenced, there is an inchoate interest in the freight, and the risk attaches, provided the language of the charter, taken with the policy, will warrant that view of the case. (Barber v. Fleming stated at length). . . . The Court of Queen's Bench held that as the ship had sailed in ballast from Bombay, with the sole object of going to Howland's Island in order to earn the freight under the charter from thence to the United Kingdom, the interest in the chartered freight had commenced, and the plaintiff was entitled to recover for a total loss. There it is clear, the vessel could only commence earning the freight at Howland's Island, and yet the plaintiff was held to have an insurable interest in the chartered freight, which was covered by the policy. It is true that in that case the ship sailed in ballast from Bombay, whereas here the vessel sailed with cargo from Calcutta to Mauritius. But the question is, what was it that gave the owner the inchoate right to the chartered freight? Thompson v. Taylor is quite conclusive.—p. 160.

ESHER, M.R.—It appears to me that the paraphrase there given of the word "navigation" accurately expressed the ordinary meaning of the word. It was there said that, if there was negligence on the part of the shipowner or his servants before the navigation of the ship commenced, which had the effect of causing the ship to be unsafely navigated during the navigation with regard to the safety of the goods, that would make the navigation "improper navigation." The ship was there sent to sea in such a condition that she could not be safely navigated with regard to the safety of the cargo, and therefore she was in fact improperly navigated. If the meaning so given to the term "improper navigation" be correct, then can it be said that the loss here was caused by improper navigation? In my opinion it cannot. The ship in this case was in a perfectly proper condition so far as regarded her capacity for being sailed with safety to the goods on board. The damage happened from something inside the ship, having nothing whatever to do with her sailing qualities, viz., the holds happening to be in a dirty condition.—[1894] 343, 344.

LORD HERSCHELL.—The respondents placed their main reliance upon The West India Telegraph Co. v. The Home and Colonial Insurance Co., and naturally so, because the majority of the C. A. thought the present case undistinguishable from it. Lord Selborne and L. C. J. Cockburn in that case held that the damage done by the explosion of the boiler of a steamer was covered by the general words of a marine policy. . . . The real ground of Lord Selborne's judgment appears to have been the analogy between damage done by the excessive pressure of the winds in the case of a sailing vessel, and the excessive pressure of steam in the boiler when the motive-power used to propel the vessel is steam. I am not satisfied that this analogy is a sound one; but, even if it be so I am unable to see how it can be treated as an authority in the present case, still less as concluding it. The water in the donkey-engine, the over pressure of which caused the damage, was certainly not to the steamer "what the winds are to a sailing vessel," and the damage was not, as it seems to me, in any way similar to the injury done to a sailing vessel by a storm of wind.—p. 633.

SMITH, L.J.—Taylor v. Dewar has held that under a clause very similar to this (the first limb of the clause) the underwriters were not liable for those damages which the assured had had to pay for personal injuries occasioned to those on board the ship run down, and that the proper construction of it was that the underwriters had only to pay the assured such damages as he had to pay in respect to the loss or damage done to the ship run down, or possibly to her freight or cargo, which for this purpose might be treated as part of herself. The Queen's Bench differed from the Scotch case of Coey v. Smith (infra), which held that the clause covered damages which the assured had to pay for personal injuries done to those on board the ship run down, as well as for the damage done to the ship itself. This case, in my judgment, instead of assisting the plaintiffs (the assured), as far as it goes assists the defendants (the underwriters), for it might be argued from it that the expenses incurred in raising a ship were not expenses incurred in respect of the loss or damage done to the ship run down.—p. 35.

WILLES, J.—I cannot pass away from the case of Livie v. Janson without referring to Mr. Phillips's very able and learned work on Insurance, vol. i. p. 673, when he throws doubt upon the authority of Lord Ellenborough's decision, referring to cases in the American Courts where the principle of that case has not been applied to the case of an absolute loss of a portion of the thing insured. Without, however, going the length of saying that Livie v. Janson is per law, I am clear that it can only apply to a case where the vessel is deteriorated, and not to a case where there has been a loss of the subject-matter of the insurance by the perils of the sea.—p. 294.

COCKBURN, C.J.—We need give no opinion upon the case of Boyd v. Dubois, though it certainly does seem to me a very strong thing to say, that where articles containing the germ of their probable destruction, such, for example, as hemp, are placed in a damaged condition on board a vessel, the insurer need not be told of it. However, we need not positively decide whether that case is right or wrong. Here a part of the cargo was wetted, but that part was landed and doubtless got dry before it was replaced in the ship. But, even assuming that some damage was done, it is very likely that neither Da Costa Brothers, nor Jacobs & Co., had any knowledge of the circumstance.

POLLOCK, B.—Our attention was called to the earlier decision of Lord Mansfield in the case of Glover v. Black, and in that case no doubt it was held that persons who advanced money on respondentia could not insure without stating who was the lender of the money upon respondentia, nor by merely stating the fact that it was upon goods. It is worth while, perhaps, to observe, with all respect to a decision like this, that long before that there had been great jealousy apparently not unnatural with regard to insurance both by those who borrowed and those who lent money on bottomry and respondentia, because it was a very common thing not merely to borrow money for the exigencies of the voyage, but a merchant would very often ship goods as a mere adventurer and borrow money which he was able to take advantage of, and would then insure himself, having all the while no interest in the voyage. And then very often, too, the lender of the money insured not only the money which he had lent but also the maritime interest which would be added to it if the voyage were successfully accomplished. All the writers seem to have set their faces against this. It is discussed in the works of both Emerigon and Pothier, and forms the subject of Art. 347 in the Code de Commerce. That being so, the case came before one of our Courts and it was very fully discussed, and undoubtedly it was found then to be the custom and general usage of merchants. All that Lord Mansfield said was, that he was very much inclined at first to support the policy, and in conclusion, he said that the ground of the present resolution of the Court was that it was established now as the law and practice of merchants that respondentia and bottomry must be mentioned and specified in the policy of insurance, but at the same time he declared that the Court did not mean to determine generally that no special interest in goods might be given in evidence in other cases than those of respondentia and bottomry if the circumstances of the case should admit of it. It seems to me that Lord Mansfield intended to make that exception, and it is somewhat remarkable that some years after a case occurred of insurance on respondentia interest, in which the words were merely on "goods, specie and effects." I allude to the case of Gregory v. Christie, infra. In that case it was held that the assured having insured in general words, "goods, specie and effects," was entitled to recover.—p. 168.

PARK, J.—In Glover v. Black (supra, col. 3492); it was decided that when the interest of the assured is in bottomry or respondentia, it must be mentioned in the policy; but the interest here is of a nature totally different from bottomry or respondentia. Lord Kenyon was new in his office when Walpole v. Ewer was decided, and the decision did not give satisfaction. Mr. Justice Buller, in Newman v. Cazalet (Park Ins. 424), differed, but put the decision on the ground of usage in the particular case; and Lord Ellenborough, in Power v. Whitmore (4 M. & S. 141), decided contrary to Walpole v. Ewer.—p. 121.

BARNES, J.—That case is an authority for the well-known proposition that where parties contemplate the freight insured to be on a full and complete cargo, and where, in fact, only a part cargo is shipped, and, therefore, the latter is all that was at risk, there must be what is called an opening of the valuation. This is not in strictness an opening of the valuation, but is merely a reduction in proportion to the amount of cargo shipped, the valuation still being held binding on what was in fact shipped. I think that judgment is based on the principle that both parties had agreed that the freight valued was the freight on a full cargo; and as this full cargo was not shipped, the value of what was at risk only must be taken. It is no authority for the contention that if the value of the freight on what was about to be shipped is estimated too highly originally and the assured is mistaken in his valuation, the valuation ought to be reduced. The truth seems to me to be that the freight upon what is not shipped is never at risk, and, therefore, to that extent the underwriters cannot be made responsible—pp. 71, 72.

WILLES, J. (for the Court).—A declaration of war imports a prohibition of commercial intercourse and correspondence with the inhabitants of the enemy's country, and such intercourse, except with the licence of the Crown, is illegal. Doubt was thrown upon the law on this subject by Bell v. Gilson (1798), where Buller and Heath, J.J. (Rooke, J., dissentiente) held, that an insurance of goods purchased in Holland during hostilities between England and Holland, on board a neutral ship, was lawful. That case, however, was, in the year 1800, overruled, Lord Kenyon being Chief Justice, by the Court of King's Bench, in Potts v. Bell (8 T. R. 548), which, together with the great case of The Hoop (1 C. Rob. 196) (1799), before Lord Stowell, then Sir William Scott, upon the authority of which Potts v. Bell was decided, has restored and finally established the rule already mentioned, that one of the consequences of war is the absolute interdiction of all commercial intercourse or correspondence between the subjects of the hostile countries, except by the permission of their respective sovereigns.—p. 779.

LORD BLACKBURN.—I think it is plain that the reasons for which the value has been held to be conclusive, extend no further than this, that for the purposes of the contract between the parties the policy may be valued at so much. Whether that principle was rightly applied in the case of the North of England Insurance Association v. Armstrong, it is not necessary now to say. I own that if I had a similar case to decide, sitting in the Court of Error, I should pause before I said it was rightly decided.—p. 342.

MANFIELD, C.J. (for the Court). The simple question in this case is, of the avowment of interest. It happened that Emanuel and Solomon Cohen were partners; and the action is brought in the name of Emanuel, and there is an avowment in each count that the interest is in one of them, and the declaration is in the ordinary form, as if the assurance had been made for one and for his sole benefit; and the plaintiff has recovered in this action for the whole loss as if the whole interest was in him. No doubt, in a different form of declaration, he might have recovered for his moiety. The verdict is certainly wrong, for it gives him, who is entitled to a moiety only, the whole; therefore the verdict cannot stand. There are contrary decisions; namely, Page v. Fry, and the case before Lee, C.J. (Hiscox v. Barrett), on the one side, and there is the case of Bell v. Ansley (infra), in the K.B., which contradicts those authorities. We are of opinion, that the verdict cannot be supported, not merely for the sake of uniformity of judgment in both Courts, but also because the avowment is contrary to truth. . . . But according to the cases of Page v. Fry, and Hiscox v. Barrett it would be sufficient to aver the interest in any manner which would show it was not a gaming policy. But what is not sufficient; it is necessary to show who are the real contracting parties. If this were not necessary, this action would not be analogous to any other; for in all other cases it is necessary to show who are the real contracting parties, otherwise the plaintiff cannot recover. If, therefore, it were sufficient, as in Page v. Fry it was said to be, to show such an interest as would make it not a gaming policy, it would materially differ the action upon a policy of insurance from all other actions on contracts. We are, therefore, of opinion that the judgment given in the case of Bell v. Ansley is right, and well founded.—pp. 107, 108.

BLACKBURN, C.J. (for the Court).—The only question now before us is whether the fact, appearing on the trial, that the ship was initiated subject to ratification by the assured, constitutes a material difference from the facts as appearing on the record when the former judgment was given, and, by reason that the contract was still open, as was contended on the argument before us, entitled the underwriter to have the loss communicated to him. Upon this point we have entertained considerable doubt, but as the case of Hagedorn v. Oliverson appears to us to be in point, and to govern the present case, we think ourselves bound by that decision, leaving the defendant to take the case to a Court of Appeal if he shall be so advised.—p. 581.

LORD PENZANCE (for J.C.).—The second ground taken by the respondents is founded upon the language attributed to a great authority (Lord Tenterden) in the case of Weir v. Aberdeen, to the effect that if a defect, though it exists at the time the vessel sailed, and exists to such an extent and is of such a character as to render the vessel unseaworthy, be remedied before any loss arises, the underwriters still remain responsible. This is a proposition of perilous latitude. It is impossible not to see that such a doctrine would tend, if carried to its legitimate consequences, to fritter away the value of this warranty altogether. It is all very well to talk of trivial and small things, but it is very difficult to define what should fall within the category of small or trivial things, and what should exceed it. It may, however, be safely observed, without going more narrowly into that subject, that the case of Weir v. Aberdeen did not proceed upon the language that is attributed to Lord Tenterden—whether he was fully and rightly reported or not—but the judgment proceeded, as it appears to their lordships, distinctly upon the principle that the underwriters had been aware of the unseaworthiness and had assented to the vessel putting back to the port to cure herself of the defect, and therefore they were held responsible. They had assented in writing on the policy to maintain their liability notwithstanding the violation of the warranty. If the statements attributed to the chief justice were to be held to be the ground of decision in that case, the case itself would come in direct conflict with many other cases, and especially the case of Forshaw v. Chabert (3 B. & B. 158), in which a defect existed at the time the vessel sailed, was completely remedied at Jamaica, the port into which the vessel put for that purpose, and after the defect the vessel was lost on the voyage from Jamaica to Liverpool; and yet the underwriters were held not responsible.

CAMPBELL, C.J.—Mr. Milward has referred to some expressions used by Parke, B., in Gibson v. Small (on page 404); but they do not at all warrant the position that there is an implied contract with every seaman that the vessel is seaworthy, and that if it is not an action will lie.—p. 407.

LORD PENZANCE (LORDS O'HAGAN, BLACKBURN and GORDEN concurring).—I do not propose to trouble your lordships by reviewing the arguments on this question, because I consider that the case of Gibson v. Small, supplemented as it was by Thompson v. Hopper (infra), and Fawcett v. Sarsfield (infra), must be considered to have set at rest the controversies on this subject, and to have finally decided that the law does not, in the absence of special stipulations in the contract, infer in the case of a time policy any warranty that the vessel at any particular time shall have been seaworthy. In pronouncing the judgment of the majority of the Court in the latter case, Lord Campbell said, "for the reasons which I gave in the case of Gibson v. Small, and which I have given in the case of Thompson v. Hopper, I think there is no implied warranty of seaworthiness in any time policy." From that time, upwards of twenty years ago, to the present, these decisions have been acted upon and submitted to, and thousands of time policies have been effected, and millions in losses adjusted under them; and whatever may be argued as to the soundness of the conclusions then arrived at, or however desirable it may be, as a matter of public policy and concern, that some such obligation of keeping his vessel, as far as it is within his power, seaworthy, should be cast on a shipowner, the law must, I submit to your lordships, be considered as settled by those decisions, and any change made in it must be by legislative authority alone.—p. 244.

BRETT, L.J.—The case cited to us is Watson v. Clark. That case is more often cited for the question of law which Lord Eldon enunciated than for his treatment of the facts. It is cited as an authority for the principle that if a ship was seaworthy at the commencement of the voyage, although she became otherwise only one hour after sailing, the warranty is complied with, and the underwriter is liable. The case also deals with the question of presumption arising from the facts. But Lord Eldon and Lord Redesdale were sitting as a Court of appeal from a decision of a Court which decided both law and fact, and they were called upon, therefore, as upon a rehearing, not only to determine what the law was, but also whether they agreed with the Court below upon the facts; and thus it is that they give their reasons for agreeing with the finding as to the facts. And when we find Lord Eldon and Lord Redesdale pointing out in the clearest terms a process of reasoning which is almost irresistible, it is a very good guide to a jury to point out to them that process of reasoning as one which they ought to follow. But we have never heard that this case was an authority for showing that a presumption of fact is really a proposition of law.—p. 601.

BULLER, J.—In later times I well remember to have seen many policies tried professedly on enemy's property, without ever hearing the objection raised. Lord Mansfield did all in his power to prevent so dishonourable a defence being made. When the case of Gist v. Mason came on, I more than once conversed with Lord Mansfield on the subject, being desirous to obtain his opinion on the legality of such insurances. On the legality, however, I never could get him to reason. He often said that in former times it was considered for the interest of the country to insure enemy's property, and on the persuasion of its being for the interest of the country, he always discountenanced any objection on that head. But he never went beyond the ground of expedience.—p. 354.

LAWRENCE, J.—The case of Denison v. Modigliani is distinguishable from the present for the reason given by my lord (Kenyon), namely, that in that case there was a legal letter of marque on board to enable the captain to take prizes. But here the letter of marque was not obtained for the purpose of enabling the ship to cruise, but of procuring seamen on board; when the seamen were procured then the letter of marque ceased to have its effect, and then it was the same as if there had been no letter of marque on board at all.—p. 383.

MANSFIELD, C.J. (for the Court).—In the case of Gregory v. Christie, Lord Mansfield, C.J., says, "The policy in question differs from others because it contains a permission to trade, as well as to touch and stay, at any ports or places, which is not usual in policies of this nature; for in general they only permit them to touch and stay, which words can only be intended to give a permission so to do if necessity obliges them." This cannot be the true construction. The clause is not required for that purpose; for every ship without any memorandum for that purpose has liberty to do what is necessary in order for the preservation of the vessel and the lives of those on board her, as to take in provisions to save the crew from starving, or to prevent her from sinking by going into port to be repaired. Such acts, though done without the sanction of these words, are no deviation. I know not who was the author of that note, and perhaps it may have been incorrectly taken. The meaning of these words then has never been defined. . . . Among the cases on this subject, which are all collected in Park, 6th ed., 388, is that of Stitt v. Wardell (infra), which has been cited in the argument. Lord Kenyon does not there at all define what is the meaning of the "liberty to touch and stay," but expresses his opinion that if that breaking bulk had happened at Cork, where the ship was entitled to touch, instead of in Dublin harbour, the policy would equally have been avoided. But as this was a sudden answer to a sudden question put by the plaintiff's counsel, what would have happened if the ship had gone into Cork, it is not a comment entitled to have much weight as an explanation of the term "liberty to touch and stay."—p. 456.

COCKBURN, C.J.—Mr. Lush indeed says that, because the words have a plain general meaning, parol evidence is not admissible to explain them; and cites, as an authority for that contention, the case of Blackett v. Royal Exchange Assurance Co., in which Lord Lyndhurst, C.B., delivering the judgment of the Court, held that a policy upon ship covering boats by its general terms, could not be restricted in its operation by parol evidence of a usage at Lloyd's that boats slung on the ship's quarter were not protected by the insurance. I, of course, am bound by that case so far as it goes; but I am not disposed to carry it any further, or to apply it to any circumstances not exactly similar. I think the case goes to the extreme verge of the law; for I am unable to see why the evidence was not admissible to show that, by general understanding among insurers, the word "boats" did not mean all boats.—p. 317.

ESHER, M.R.—The next case in order of time Blackett v. Royal Exchange Assurance Co., arose in this country. It came before the Court of Exchequer when Lord Lyndhurst was chief Baron who, great and excellent as he was in many respects, was scarcely a great mercantile lawyer. Still, the decision must be followed, especially as it was given in 1832, and has never since been overruled. It was the case of a voyage policy on the ship Thames, "at and from London to Calcutta," with the memorandum "free from average under 3 per cent. unless general;" and the Court, in a considered judgment, held that the different losses occurring during the same voyage must be added together, although they were in fact distinct losses arising from different causes. That is to say, they followed the rule in a policy on ship which had been recognised with regard to policies on goods. I shall venture to criticise the judgment to this extent, that the Court do not appear to have considered the business aspect of the case. They decided upon the ordinary rule of construction applicable to other instruments—that the memorandum was in the nature of an exception—an exception in favour of the assured, and that where a stipulation or a contract is in favour of one of the parties it is to be construed most strictly against him. I shall presently give my reasons for not applying such rules to a mercantile instrument such as this; but the case is a binding authority with regard to a voyage policy.

ESHER, M.R. (for the Court).—Questions of wear and tear or damage from sea perils are, no doubt, more easily decided in the case of the ship than of the goods. But with regard to a great many injuries to the ship, it is just as difficult to say when the whole injury took place. If one injury is the loss of her topmast, and the other the blowing away of her sail in a different storm, it is very easy to distinguish between them, but in the case of other damages, as when the ship is strained in a storm, and in the same voyage there is another storm, it would be difficult to say whether there was a new strain whether in the same or in a different part of the ship or a further strain beyond what occurred in the first storm. So that I think the difficulties with regard to wear and tear and damage from sea perils arise in the case of ship as well as in the case of goods, and that the memorandum was adopted to avoid trifling disputes. In old times I have no doubt that the 3 per cent. was a very fair amount to cover these small losses. Ships were much smaller than they are now, and their value was less, but their size and value have now increased to such a degree that 3 per cent., as compared with the value of the ship, will cover very considerable losses, but merchants and insurers, with that indolence which belongs to mercantile transactions, have not taken the trouble to alter the rate of percentage, and part of the argument in this case was that in the case of a valuable ship even less than 3 per cent. may represent a considerable sum. But this fact cannot alter the construction of the memorandum, which must be construed in the same way as when it was first introduced, and when there was not the same limitation in the case of time policies as there is now. The first case to be dealt with is the American case of Brooks v. Oriental Insurance Co. It came before a judge whose decisions I have often read with admiration, and from whom I have certainly received great assistance, Mr. Justice Putnam. It was a time policy on ship, there were successive losses, and the second question was, "Are distinct successive losses to be added together to make up the 5 per cent.?" The judgment is, "We are of opinion that distinct and successive losses are not to be added together in order to make up the 5 per cent., and that the damage from disasters happening at one time or in one continued gale or storm is to be considered by itself. If this were otherwise, the insurers would be called upon to pay for a great many trifling losses which should be borne by the assured, as coming within the common wear and tear of the ship."

I cannot accede to this reasoning, for one continued gale or storm may last three days and nights, and it would not be easy to say whether the losses were distinct. Suppose the ship scrapes a rock and is damaged in her keel, and suppose that on the second or third day of that continued storm she loses her mast, this damage would have nothing to do with the injury to her keel. The two injuries are as distinct as if they occurred in separate storms. It was argued that we ought to adopt the rule laid down in this case, and that each distinct loss must be dealt with by itself, though happening on the same voyage; but, as I have said, I cannot adopt the reasoning of Putnam, J.

Donnell v. Columbian Insurance Co. (1836)

Stewart v. Merchants' Marine Insurance Co. (1885) 55 L. J. Q. B. 81, 16 Q. B. D. 619; 53 L. T. 892; 34 W. R. 208; 5 Asp. M. C. 506.—C.A.

ESHER, M.R.—Then we have a very elaborate judgment of Story, J., in America, in Donnell v. Columbian Insurance Co. In that case the policy was on the ship, and was a voyage policy. There was a series of stoppages, but the voyage insured was from Baltimore to ports in succession and thence to a port of discharge in Europe or the United States. Story, J., came to the conclusion that the losses must be added together to see whether they came within the memorandum. He gives another rule of construction, which, if one were to apply it to this policy, might carry the decision one way. He says, this memorandum is an exception from a loss which is applicable to the whole voyage, and he says it is a rule of construction that the exception must be applied to the same subject-matter as that from which it is excepted. It will be seen that the case is one of a voyage policy on ship, and therefore what it really decides is that losses on the same voyage are to be added together. So that it agrees with Blackett v. Royal Exchange Insurance Co. (supra, col. 3513). There are, therefore, two instances which decide that where the policy is a voyage policy on ship the losses must be added together, and they are opposed to the view taken in the other American case, that each loss in the same voyage is to be considered by itself. So far as a voyage policy is concerned, I think these two decisions must be followed.—p. 624.

LORD CHELMSFORD (for J.C.).—Upon the argument before their lordships, the Solicitor-General for the respondents very properly admitted that the notice of abandonment was in its terms sufficient. The case upon which the Recorder founded his judgment of the insufficiency of the notice was a visi prius case of Parmeter v. Todhunter, in which there having been a verbal notice that the ship insured had been captured, recaptured, and carried into Grenada, and that the underwriters were required to settle as for a total loss, and to give directions as to the disposition of the ship and cargo, Lord Ellenborough said, "The abandonment must be express and direct, and I think the word 'abandon' should be used to render it effectual." But whatever strictness of construction may have been applied to notices of abandonment in former times, it never could have been absolutely necessary to use the technical word "abandon"; any equivalent expressions which informed the underwriters that it was the intention of the assured to give up to them the property insured upon the ground of its having been totally lost, must always have been sufficient.

BRETT L.J.—In Rankin v. Potter the law was established that where at the time when the assured receives information which would otherwise oblige him to give notice of abandonment, at the same time he hears that the subject-matter of the insurance had been sold so as to pass the property away, inasmuch as there was nothing of the subject-matter of the insurance which he could abandon, notice of abandonment was not necessary. No doubt the reason given for this was that notice at that time and under such circumstances would be a mere idle ceremony, it could be of no use. That was the point decided in Rankin v. Potter. In those particular circumstances it was held that notice of abandonment need not be given because there was nothing to abandon. That in one sense is true, but if the goods had been sold it is obvious there must be something to abandon, that is the proceeds of the sale; the money which is the proceeds of the sale, when the insurance is settled, is abandoned, but there is nothing of the subject-matter of insurance to abandon; there is no ship to abandon, there are no materials of the ship to abandon, there are no goods to abandon; therefore notice of abandonment under those circumstances was said to be futile. But Rankin v. Potter went no further; it did not decide—because the point was not raised—that if at the time when the assured had to make up his mind and when otherwise he ought to abandon, there was no sale of the subject-matter of the insurance, the assured would be excuse from giving notice of abandonment if he was able to show that had he given such notice, in the result it would have turned out to be of no use.—p. 13.

JERVIS, C.J.—The point decided, in Davy v. Milford, is expressed with tolerable correctness in the marginal note. . . . That this note correctly expresses the opinion of the Court, and that their decision in no respect turned upon the fact of the flax having been shipped in separate mats, distinctly appears from the language of the judgment at p. 566.—p. 305.

TENTHEDEN, C.J. (for the Court).—If the abandonment is to be viewed with regard to the ultimate state of facts, as appearing before the action brought, according to the opinion of the Court in Bainbridge v. Neilson, there has not, for the reasons already given, been a total loss. Doubts were expressed as to the propriety of the decision in Bainbridge v. Neilson by a very high authority, in the case of Smith v. Robertson (infra). But notwithstanding those doubts, the rule, as laid down in Bainbridge v. Neilson, was adopted and acted upon by the Court in the two subsequent cases of Patterson v. Ritchie (infra), and Brotherton v. Barber (infra): we consider the point to have been well settled, and the rule established by these authorities.—p. 724.

ERLE, C.J. (for the Court).—We were much pressed with the argument that the case of Conway v. Gray has been constantly acted on by all the parties interested in insurance law. The answer is, that the fact is disputed. The treatises lead to a contrary conclusion; and even if the assertion were true, still the plaintiffs ought to have our judgment, provided we think that the decision of the inferior Court, which would bind till it was overruled, was contrary to law; and that is our opinion.—p. 182.

A. L. SMITH L.J.—If, then, this had been a case between the original underwriter and original assured, there could not have been a doubt about it, and there does not seem to have been a doubt raised in any reported case until the year 1890, when Mathew and Cave, JJ., in the unreported case of Nord Deutsche Versicherungs Gesellschaft v. Merchants Marine Insurance Co. refused to make an order for ships papers, as it was a case of re-insurance. This case was cited in Willis & Co. v. Baddeley which came before the C. A. in 1892. There the real question was whether, where the agent of a principle resident abroad was bringing an action in his own name, the defendant was entitled to discovery to the same extent as if the principal were a party to the action; but Bowen, L.J., and I both expressed our opinion that we were not prepared to agree with the decision of Mathew and Cave, JJ., in the unreported case as to the production of ships' papers in cases of re-insurance. . . . It was also said that in the unreported case of Royal Exchange Assurance Corporation v. Faber in 1897, Collins, J., at Chambers, made an order for ships' papers in a case of re-insurance. For myself, I think he was quite right in making the order. . . . Henderson v. Underwriting and Agency Association (supra, col. 3529) is obviously distinguishable. The claim there was not on a policy of marine insurance. The transit was partly by land, and the words "of the seas" were struck out of the clause enumerating the perils insured against, the words "of transit or conveyance" being substituted for them. Cave, J., rightly refused to apply the well-known practice as to the production of ships' papers, which had always been applied to actions on policies of marine insurance only, to a policy of insurance on goods during a transit on land.—p. 738.

 KELLY, C.B.—The only case at all like it . . . is that of Westwood v. Bell. There undoubtedly a sub-agent was held to be entitled to a lien as against the principal in respect of certain premiums which he had paid. But a distinction, and a marked and obvious one, between that case and the case now before the Court is that in Wright v. Bell the party there, the sub-agent in the situation of the present defendant, did not know that there was any principal at all behind the person who had actually employed him in the business. —p. 376.
